As is well known, commerce on the Mississippi River has dwindled away until its commercial importance is to-day trifling. In 1880 the volume of traffic on the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo was reported as 1,030,000 tons, and with a ruling depth of water of only 3½ to 4 feet. Since that time the Government has expended $15,574,000 to provide an 8-foot depth of water over this section of the river, and such a channel has been available to traffic for years. The traffic on the river, however, has steadily decreased and was only 265,000 tons in 1912.

The money which Congress has appropriated to improve these 206 miles of the Mississippi River in the last 25 years has far exceeded the amount spent by Germany in the improvement of the River Rhine from the frontier of Holland to Strassburg, a distance of 355 miles. Yet this section of the Mississippi had only 265,000 tons of traffic in 1912, while the commerce on the Rhine was nearly 40,000,000 tons, or about one hundred and fifty times as great. In addition to the amount above noted, there has been spent by the Government on the lower Mississippi between Cairo and the Head of the Passes, since 1879, the sum of $78,409,000, notwithstanding which fact the traffic shows a steady decrease. It fell off one-half in the decade from 1901 to 1910.

It may be remarked in this connection that it is not always safe to take mere tonnage figures as a basis on which to estimate the importance of commerce on an inland stream. An analysis of the commercial statistics shows that in many cases the tonnage of traffic which is reported consists largely of sand, gravel, and stone. In 1910 more than a third of the Mississippi River commerce between Vicksburg and New Orleans consisted of these low-grade materials.

It should not be understood that Senator BURTON in his reports stands opposed to all appropriations for river and harbor improvement. On the contrary, he approves of the expenditure of public money upon those projects which can be shown to justify the expenditure upon them by the traffic which they bear. Many so-called rivers included in the river and harbor appropriation bill are really arms of the sea. The money expended upon them to enable ocean vessels, larger or smaller in size, to navigate them and use them as harbors shows often very large returns in the way of benefits to commerce.

There is a general popular impression that the United States has been derelict in the improvement of its seaports. Regarding this, Senator BURTON says:

"The United States has first-class harbors not only in much greater number than any other country of the world, but the distance between them is generally not so great as in the very thickly populated countries of Europe. The Republic of France has but four or five first-class harbors, and Germany has but three. The harbors of the United States already improved, or on which improvements are well under way, surpass those of any other country."

It is with respect to the improvement of inland waterways that Senator BURTON'S chief criticism is directed. Prior to the advent of the railway as a freight carrier the navigable rivers of the country rendered an important service in carrying long-distance traffic. Analysis of the present water-borne traffic proves that long-distance inland transportation by water has almost wholly disappeared. Where the rivers are still being used for freight it is almost wholly local.

Turning now to the record of actual results from the Government expenditures on inland waterways, Senator BURTON instances the Red River below Fulton, Ark. For a distance of 475 miles on this river there was, in 1912, a total traffic of 44,967 tons, of which 42,640 tons were saw logs. The United States has spent on the improvement of this stream $2,768,000, and the pending river and harbor bill proposes to add $100,000 to this sum. Senator BURTON computes that, figuring interest at 4 per cent, the cost to the Government for every ton of traffic carried on this stream last year would be $4.68. With the saw logs excluded—since they have been floated on the river without any improvement—the cost per ton to the Government would be $90.56 and the cost per ton-mile $1.53. The Red River, moreover, is not an isolated example of the waste of river and harbor appropriations by any means. The United States has spent on the Arkansas River $3,108,000, and the pending bill proposes to add $164,000 more, yet the river carries a total traffic of only 71,516 tons in a year, of which 56,000 tons were saw logs. Going to the far West, on the Columbia River about Portland, the United States has spent about $9,000,000, and the total traffic on this stretch of the river is now only about 80,000 tons per annum.

There has been great agitation in recent years, as many of our readers will recall, to secure the improvement of the Missouri River. Great things were promised by certain commercial associations as to a revival of boat traffic upon that stream, and the agitators were successful some years ago in inducing Congress to resume appropriations for its improvement.

Before the advent of the railway the Missouri was, indeed, an important avenue of traffic for the pioneers, but steamboat traffic on it disappeared years ago, and in 1902 Congress decided that it was not worth while to expend further money on the stream. At that time the appropriations for it had amounted to $7,227,000. As a result of the agitation above referred to, the Government is now committed to a project to spend $20,000,000 more on the river between Kansas City and its mouth, of which $4,400,000 have already been appropriated. The traffic on the river in 1912 was 185,110 tons, of which sand and gravel hauled 1 mile made up 155,420 tons, leaving 29,690 tons for all other freight. The bulk of even this, however, was local traffic, and the only long-distance traffic to be found in the record is 4,173 tons of miscellaneous freight carried 339 miles and 1,404 tons of manufactured iron and steel products carried 158 miles.

Senator BURTON, however, suggests the real reason behind the agitation for the Missouri River improvement. From an official report filed in 1908 it appears that lands adjacent to the river, amounting to over half a million acres, would be benefited by the proposed improvement. Naturally, the owners of this land desired to have it protected from erosion or overflow at the expense of the Federal Government.

The most signal instance of waste of public funds in river and harbor appropriations, however, is in connection with the improvement of rivers by slack-water navigation. "It may be confidently asserted," says Senator BURTON, "that the only waterways in the United States which can be profitably improved by the construction of locks and dams are the Monongahela, the Kanawha, and the Ohio, which are improved by the Federal Government, and the Barge Canal connecting Lake Erie and the Hudson River, improved by the State of New York. It is possible also that the improvement of the Allegheny and the Black Warrior River in Alabama will prove desirable."

We should say that it is an open question whether the traffic on even these streams will in the end justify the expenditure which has been made upon their improvement. Certainly at the present time, with the sole exception of the Monongahela, there has been no evidence of such a result.

As examples of waste of public funds in slack-water navigation, Senator BURTON cites among others the famous Hennepin Canal, which connects the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers. Its advocates 30 years ago maintained that its construction would save the public $20,000,000 per annum in freight. Its construction dragged along over many years with the piecemeal appropriations, which Senator BURTON roundly condemns, and it was finally opened for traffic in 1908. Up to date the Government expenditures upon it have been in round numbers $8,740,000, and it carried last year only 11,962 tons of commercial freight. In the year 1909 the tonnage of material hauled for repairs and improvement of the canal itself was more than 22 times as great as the commercial freight handled over the canal.

Muscle Shoals Canal, on the Tennessee River, has cost the Government $4,500,000, and in 1912 the freight passing through the canal amounted to 5,520 tons.

On the Big Sandy River, located on the boundary between Kentucky and West Virginia, the Government has expended about $2,000,000 in constructing locks and dams, and the total tonnage carried in 1912 was 500 tons. During this same period the railway operating in the Big Sandy Valley handled 2,225,000 tons of freight.

These are extreme, but not isolated, examples of the practically total failure of the Government's expenditures in slack-water navigation projects to produce any benefit to commerce at all proportionate to the cost. Yet in the face of these well-known facts, Government appropriations for building locks and dams still continue. There might be the shadow of an excuse for them where such structures are built to complete a project already begun; but what possible excuse can there be for the Government to undertake new projects for improving inland rivers by a system of transportation which has been proved obsolete? The present river and harbor bill, however, contains appropriations to begin the construction of a complete system of locks and dams on the Brazos and Trinity Rivers in Texas. Senator BURTON sets the cost of the entire project at $10,000,000 for each of these rivers, and there is reason to believe that much larger sums would be required before the useless work could be carried to final completion.

Much more could be said to prove that of the $60,000,000 a year which the Government spends for navigation improvement, a large part is spent on works which afford no corresponding benefit to commerce; but the facts are already well known to many engineers. That the remedy for this wholesale waste does not lie in change of political parties is seen by the fact that the Democratic majority responsible for the present river and harbor bill has pursued the same methods and gone merely a little further than its Republican predecessors. It is seen also in the fact that some of the Progressive Party leaders have been leaders also in the popular agitation in favor of waterway improvements.

How strongly the beneficiaries of the present river and harbor system are intrenched is proved by the fact that with all the exposures of its iniquities by such men as Senator BURTON and President Taft, and many years ago by President Cleveland, to say nothing of many others of prominence, the system still continues to draw money from the National Treasury in a flood which increases year by year.

Some time perhaps some influential commercial or technical organization may be able to bring about a reform. Until that happens the Nation will continue to calmly pour out millions a year into pools and ditches to perpetuate obsolete systems of transportation and benefit a traffic which has disappeared.

THE LONG AND SHORT HAUL CLAUSE (S. DOC. NO. 542).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have had a great many requests that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on what is known as the "long and short haul clause" shall be printed as a public document. I ask that 3,000 copies may be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9622. An act for the relief of the heirs of Waldo M. Potter, deceased, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

LOUIS EDER.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4714) to authorize Louis Eder to enter lands under the homestead laws, which was, on page 1, line 6, after "of," where it first occurs, to insert "surveyed unreserved and."

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL ENTRY OF OIL LANDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. ( ) to provide for agricultural entry of oil lands, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That lands withdrawn or classified as phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals, or which are valuable for those deposits, shall be subject to appropriation, location, selection, entry, or purchase, if otherwise available, under the nonmineral land laws of the United States, whenever such location, selection, entry, or purchase shall be made with a view of obtaining or passing title with a reservation to the United States of the deposits on account of which the lands were withdrawn or classified or reported as valuable, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same; but no desert entry made under the provisions of this act shall contain more than 160 acres: Provided, That all applications to locate, select, enter, or purchase under this section shall state that the same are made in accordance with and subject to the provisions and reservations of this act.

SEC. 2. That upon satisfactory proof of full compliance with the provisions of the laws under which the location, selection, entry, or purchase is made, the locator, selector, entryman, or purchaser shall be entitled to a patent to the land located, selected, entered, or purchased, which patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of the deposits on account of which the lands so patented were withdrawn or classified or reported as valuable, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, such deposits to be subject to disposal by the United States only as shall be hereafter expressly directed by law. Any person qualified to acquire the reserved deposits may enter upon said lands with a view of prospecting for the same upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking to be filed with him as security for the payment of all damages to the crops and improvements on such lands by reason of such prospecting, the measure of any such damage to be fixed by agreement of parties or by a court of competent jurisdiction. Any person who has acquired from the United States the title to or the right to mine and remove the reserved deposits, should the United States dispose of the mineral deposits in lands, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining and removal of the minerals therefrom, and mine and remove such minerals, upon payment of damages caused thereby to the owner of the land, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond or undertaking therefor in an action instituted in any competent court to ascertain and fix said damages: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to deny or abridge the right to present and have prompt consideration of applications to locate, select, enter, or purchase, under the land laws of the United States, lands which have been withdrawn or classified as phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic mineral lands, with a view of disproving such classification and securing patent without reservation, nor shall persons who have located, selected, entered, or purchased lands subsequently withdrawn, or classified as valuable for said mineral deposits, be debarred from the privilege of showing, at any time before final entry, purchase, or approval of selection or location, that the lands enterd, selected, or located are in fact nonmineral in character.

SEC. 3. That any person who has, in good faith, located, selected, entered, or purchased, or any person who shall hereafter locate, select, enter, or purchase, under the nonmineral land laws of the United States, any lands which are subsequently withdrawn, classified, or reported as being valuable for phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals, may, upon application therefor, and making satisfactory proof of compliance with the laws under which such lands are claimed, receive a patent therefor, which patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of all deposits on account of which the lands were withdrawn, classified, or reported as being valuable, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same.

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act to provide for agricultural entry of lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as containing phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the House, while they have stricken out all but the enacting clause, have inserted the bill as it passed the Senate, except that they have made it general instead of applying only to Wyoming. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, who has examined the bill, has asked me to move to concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has submitted the question to the committee. I will say, for the information of the Senator, that the subject has been before the committee a number of times, and there have always been objections to making it universal; but personally I have always been in favor of its being made applicable to all the States of the Union. I know that in the past there have been some objections; but if the chairman of the committee feels sure that the committee is in favor of it I shall not object.

Mr. WARREN. I will say that this matter was submitted to the chairman of the committee, who had it under consideration for a day or more, and who asked me to move concurrence in the House amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

TREATIES WITH NICARAGUA AND COLOMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 411, submitted on the 6th instant by Mr. BORAH, as follows:

Resolved, That the seal of secrecy is hereby removed from all of the hearings heretofore had which have been printed, except such testimony as may have been received under a pledge of confidence, and that hereafter all hearings be given to the public as soon as the same are corrected by the parties and printed, touching the proposed treaties with Nicaragua and Colombia, and that the consideration of both the treaties with Nicaragua and Colombia be in the open session of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Idaho to let that resolution go over until to-morrow. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, is very much engaged to-day with other and very important matters. He left the Chamber a little while ago and requested me to make that statement. I suggest that the resolution go over until to-morrow at the same time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course, if the Senator from Missouri is otherwise engaged, I could not refuse the request, but I should like to say that it is quite possible that I shall not be here to-morrow or the next day; and if the resolution goes over to-day, I should like it understood that it shall go over until Monday next.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; I am perfectly willing to agree to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over until Monday next. Morning business is closed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13811, the river and harbor bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KENYON. I object.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. KENYON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, at the close of my remarks on Monday last I spoke of the tendency to improve branch streams before the main stream to which they are tributaries was thoroughly developed, a custom quite as objectionable as it would be to build branch lines of railway before the main trunk line was finished. This tendency illustrates one of the most vicious features of the whole system, namely, that river and harbor improvements, and especially river improvements, are adopted in pursuance of local pressure, that a district or State insists that it shall have recognition in the bill and a certain amount of money appropriated, whether the project favored be a part of a well-devised plan of public works or merely an isolated improvement.

The pending bill contains many illustrations of this very objectionable, I may say vicious, method. There are instances in which the branch streams are developed to a much higher stage of improvement, in both depth and capacity for navigation, than the rivers into which they empty.

I can not too strongly condemn this method, and I shall call attention to the instances in this bill, with the hope that the Senate may correct this very objectionable manner of prosecuting our public works.

The next objection to the system to which I wish to call attention—which is also exemplified in the pending bill—is the plan of improving in many cases the upper portion or a central portion of a river before improving that section nearest to the mouth. The rational method in which to conduct these public works in the improvement of rivers is to begin at the mouth and work upward. Presumably the mouth is at the sea or at the junction with a larger river. There is ordinarily no method which we can justify except to begin in the largest or widest portion, which is the point at which it empties into the sea or into a larger river, and then work upstream.

There are certain exceptions to that rule. The first exception is when the regimen of the river demands a different treatment. Sometimes a river is navigable for the greater part of its length for a certain number of days of the year, while in the upper portion nearest to the sources, near perhaps to mountains or elevated lands, the descent is so steep and the fall so rapid that it is navigable for only a small portion of the year. In such a case as this, where, say, in the central or lower portion there is navigation for 300 days and in the upper portion for only 100 days, it is justifiable to improve the upper portion to bring it on a parity with the lower portions before the whole river, including the lower sections, is raised to the highest standard of efficiency.

The best illustration in the country of this is the Ohio River. Beginning with the head of the river, at the junction of the Allegheny and the Monongahela Rivers, the river descends at a very much greater rate of declivity than in the lower portions, and thus, before any improvement was made, navigation was limited in that part immediately below Pittsburgh to a comparatively small fraction of the year, less than 100 days, and it was thought desirable to construct locks and dams in the upper portion so that the whole river might have a somewhat equal degree of navigability and might be available during all the days of the year or as near to all the days of the year as possible.

This affords an illustration of one exception to the general rule, which in this case is very much emphasized by the fact that the major part of the trade originating in the river comes from Pittsburgh and the two tributaries, the Monongahela and the Allegheny Rivers, more especially the Monongahela.

That is exception No. 1 to the general rule. Exception No. 2 occurs in a case in which there is a large independent traffic on a single reach of the river, the upper, the middle, or some other portion other than that nearest to the mouth. This exceptional condition is closely related to that which precedes. I may take again the illustration of the Ohio River. There is a large traffic from Pittsburgh originating there, and thus a considerable independent traffic on that upper portion of the river. So to a certain extent this is true of the Tennessee River in that section, 188 miles in length, from Knoxville to Chattanooga. Nevertheless these exceptional cases, of which I have mentioned two—first, the regimen of the river, and, second, the necessities of traffic on the upper portion—do not affect the general rule.

There is still a third exception in cases where very large quantities of material needed for the improvement of the river are found in an upper section. This condition would exist where it was necessary to use large quantities of such material as stone, sand, or gravel, and abundant supplies were available in the upper portion which could not be shipped out from there because of certain obstacles.

I regard the third exception as altogether the least important of the three; I can not raise my voice too strongly in favor of a radical reform in our methods in this regard, first, against the improvement of branch streams on a larger scale and to a higher stage of efficiency than the main stream, and, second, against the independent improvement of upper sections of rivers before their lower sections are properly treated.

There is another objection to this system which also illustrates the pressure brought to bear by Representatives in Congress representing their respective districts and Senators representing the different States, and that involves the disposition, when a system of locks and dams is to be installed, to start simultaneously on different locks and dams in various sections of the river, and thus postpone improvements indefinitely. There are to-day some locks and dams for which the complete appropriation was made prior to 1907 which are even yet incomplete. Indeed, I think it may be said that, excluding the Ohio River, where rapid progress has been made, in a majority of the instances those which are now under way were commenced more than seven years ago. The origin of this is plain. District A desires an improvement, the construction of a lock and dam, so that they may have recognition and so that employment may be given to labor and the contractors. District B desires the same. District C desires the same, and perhaps the districts run considerably further down the letters of the alphabet.

All this is vicious in the extreme. I can give one very good illustration. A lock and dam were constructed in the Trinity River below the town of Dallas. In view of a defective sewerage system in that city, it was desirable that the water of the Trinity River, into which that sewage was discharged, should flow freely without the obstacle afforded by a dam, and hence the lock and dam were not utilized. There was no way to prove whether there was sufficient water in that pool to make the lock and dam of any value. There was no way to utilize that lock and dam, though finished.

Again, if that stream is to be improved, the next lock should be constructed and completed before a single other lock was commenced. But instead of that we have them scattered along in the stream in different counties and different congressional districts, in utter disregard of any rational plan for the improvement of the river.

I may say again in regard to this stream that I think we should not proceed one step further until a survey now being made is finished and the results are furnished to Congress. It is of very doubtful expediency, to say the best. Yet we are going on with the construction of scattered locks and dams along that river with no assurance whatever that there will be a sufficient supply of water in the pools to render them useful, and with absolutely no confidence that when this whole expensive improvement is completed it will be in any degree a factor in solving the transportation problem of the country.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator why we do that? Would any business concern in the world run its business that way? Why do we do it?

Mr. BURTON. The method has been adopted very largely in response to the demands of Congressmen in the different districts where locks and dams are proposed. I dislike to admit it, but that is the one main reason why that is done. Thus, one is commenced and work on it lingers 5 or 10 years, or even more, before the first one is finally completed. Meanwhile others are begun, and the one that would prove whether the improvement was valuable or not is left incomplete.

Mr. President, one needs only to state this proposition to show its absurdity.

Mr. KENYON. I quite agree with the Senator, but suppose the Representative fails of reelection; suppose that he has not secured enough of this appropriation to convince the people that he is the right man to represent them, and there may be some creeks in the district that are not taken care of, and a new Representative is elected, then he may have a different notion as to where the locks and dams should be; and if he has influence enough the process goes on without limit, does it not? It is entirely probable that it may, on the theory that the Senator suggests, as to why this is done.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; except that the locks and dams presumably are located by the Engineering Corps, and their exact location can not be changed by the insistence of any Representative. A new Representative could, however, say, "You ought not to proceed with lock 3; you ought to proceed with lock 7." I give that merely as an illustration.

Mr. KENYON. The reports of the engineers are oftentimes influenced by the appearance of Representatives before them, are they not?

Mr. BURTON. I fear that a very considerable amount of influence is exercised on the Board of Engineers by the appearance of Representatives before them I do not think that was formerly the case, but I know in many of these reports of the board of review you will find an enumeration of the Senators and Representatives who have appeared before the board, and, I take it, that enumeration is significant. I note other instances in which the board of review have sent in here an adverse report on projects, but on the appearance of Representatives and Senators, reenforced by delegations from chambers of commerce and persons representing commercial interests—possibly contractors—the judgment of the board of review has been changed.

There is one instance, to which I will refer later in the debate, where an organization known as the Booster Club seems to have presented arguments that led the engineers and the board to change their judgment so that they recommended a project costing four and a half million dollars, which they had previously rejected.

Mr. President, I do not like to dwell upon these features which have so influenced our river and harbor legislation. After all, it is not so much the fault of Senators and Representatives. They are expected to represent their constituents; they can hardly rise above the ideals and opinions of the voters who elect them. I have known of campaigns being waged in which one candidate would say, "I obtaine such and such appropriations for river and harbor improvements or for a public building," while the other candidate—the one who was seeking to displace the incumbent—would say, "Your Representative has been negligent in getting appropriations for your rivers and harbors. Just put me in, and I will open up the Treasury so that the money will flow out in full and generous quantity."

Thus we see the fault does not rest with the Senator or the Representative. If Members of this body and Members of the other House were left alone to act free from pressure, I believe these river and harbor bills would be relieved of every blemish, of every scandal which has found its way into them; but, as I have so frequently said, it is demanded by a locality that their Representative in Washington obtain appropriations for the improvement of rivers and creeks and harbors; and I may say, Mr. President, with the utmost confidence, that that pressure has been stronger, that insistence has been greater, that hounding of the Representative has been more severe just about in proportion as the project was most objectionable.

I am becoming very much afraid of a river and harbor project carrying a large appropriation which requires numerous delegations to come to Washington to argue for its adoption.

I am still more afraid of those proposed improvements for the promotion of which associations are formed, sometimes having salaried officers who make it a point to come here to Washington and to become acquainted with Senators and Representatives, who get the ear of the largest number of public servants possible, and who, contemporaneously with that, maintain a press bureau setting before the people the advantages of their improvements. I am always afraid when in the days in which a rivers and harbors bill is pending a sheaf of telegrams is sent in here on behalf of some particular expenditure or appropriation. It is usually easy to find out that there is an organization behind it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not interrupted the Senator from Ohio since he began his speech a good many days ago, and I do not think I shall interrupt him any more. I am not interrupting him now for the purpose of engaging in any argument with him about his several propositions, but I am doing so simply for the purpose of trying to understand the position of the Senator with reference to a hearing before the Board of Engineers.

I have understood the Senator heretofore and in his present speech as speaking in the highest terms of the Army engineers who are assigned to this work, and of the Board of Engineers, as it is now organized and as it has at all times been organized. I do not understand the Senator is attacking the competency or the purposes and motives of the Board of Engineers.

Mr. BURTON. No; I do not. I think they have made grave mistakes. I think it would be better if no delegations of Representatives appeared before the commission.

Mr. SIMMONS. We will get to that a little bit later. Does the Senator have in mind any better method of investigating and determining these questions and advising Congress with reference to them than the Board of Engineers?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I think, Mr. President, these bills of recent years have shown that a certain amount of review outside of the Board of Engineers would be desirable. I have repeatedly expressed my opinion, not only in this debate but in prior years, that it was really not the fault of the engineers or the Board of Engineers. Ten years ago they were exceedingly careful and conservative; but in some instances, where they placed the seal of their condemnation on projects urged before Congress, Congress by legislation showed its disapproval of their course, and by the size of the river and harbor bills and by the class of projects which it has adopted has, as it were, sent a mandate to the executive department of its desire to prosecute a certain class of improvements which I do not believe the engineers, if left to their own individual judgment, would approve.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President, the Senator will not deny the absolute necessity of having an engineer first survey a proposed project?

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not deny that probably the engineer is the very best and most competent person to make that preliminary investigation?

Mr. BURTON. No; I do not.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not overlook the fact that after the district engineer has made that investigation and before the Engineer Board is required to act upon it it has to pass through the hands of the division engineer?

Mr. BURTON. That is, if his rank is under that of lieutenant colonel.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. And hence, before it gets to the board, it has had action upon the part of two Government officials—one a district engineer and one a division engineer.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, I want to ask the Senator, would he abolish the Board of Engineers?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. What would the Senator do? Would he create another board to review the action of the Board of Engineers?

Mr. BURTON. First of all, I would discuss right here in the Senate the whole subject of river and harbor improvements; I would point out the tendencies, the direction in which we are drifting—and I intend to do that before I get through—I would seek to discuss the matter as a business proposition, as to the expenditure of public funds, and inquire whether we are spending money economically and judiciously in this bill; and, under the high responsibility resting upon us and in view of our general acquaintance with commerce and kindred affairs, we should express our opinions on these subjects and enact measures in accordance with such opinions.

I do not know whether or not the Senate will agree with what I think is a proper policy; but I want to present to the Senator from North Carolina and also to the Senator from Louisiana some appropriations which we have been making and to ask them if they think they are economical and proper expenditures of public money. I think the responsibility of determining that question first rests with us and not with any engineering corps or any subordinate officials of the Government, nor even with the heads of the executive departments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not now discussing that phase of the subject with the Senator. Of course I do not object to the Senator—and nobody will object to the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator—discussing in the Senate to the fullest extent the river and harbor bill or any of the items in the river and harbor bill. The Senator since he has been a Member of the Senate has never failed, when a river and harbor bill was up, to give his views upon the question with great forcefulness and with great elaboration; but I understood the Senator to be criticizing the method by which Congress gets the information upon which we build a river and harbor bill, and the Senator was, I thought, rather criticizing the Board of Engineers in charge of rivers and harbors. What I desired to elicit from the Senator was his opinion as to whether we should abolish that board or, if we are to retain that board, whether he meant to state to the Senate that we ought to establish some other board to review their action besides the committee of the Senate, the committee of the House of Representatives, and the Senate and House of Representatives themselves?

Mr. BURTON. I would not abolish the board; I would not abolish the custom of first making preliminary examinations, and then detailed surveys; but under a system for which no one individual, no one body is responsible, we have, as I believe, gone to great and inexcusable lengths in the pathway of extravagance and waste. It is not altogether for me to point out what the way should be, but there is a way I can point out, I think, which is to select the improper items and reject them, put them out of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but that is not the phase of the matter I was discussing with the Senator. The Senator knows perfectly well that after the Board of Engineers has passed upon an item, then it must go to the Chief of Engineers, and before it can be acted upon by Congress, under the present law, it has to receive either his approval or disapproval. So we have the district engineer; we have the division engineer; we have the Board of Engineers; and we have the Chief of Engineers, who have to consider each one of these projects before we can act upon them; and, if they disapprove of a project, under the law we have no right to put it in a river and harbor bill.

Mr. BURTON. They are sometimes put in; there are some in this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, the Senator says there is no responsibility in connection with the approval of these items. I wanted to ask the Senator if he would not tell the Senate what more responsible investigation and examination of these questions preliminary to the action by the committee could we have than we have now? If the Senator has any definite views about that, I, for one, would be very glad to have them.

Mr. BURTON. I want to say what I have repeatedly said before, that I do not wish to visit censure or blame on the Board of Review, the Chief of Engineers, or any of the subordinates in that corps. They have been doing just what they thought Congress and the country desired that they should do; they are not seeking to set up their judgment against the legislative branch; they consider the legislative branch to be their master, and if the legislative branch justifies appropriations of a certain class it is for them to approve the projects.

I can not quite agree with the Senator from North Carolina in attaching such importance to the fact that these projects must first be considered by a local engineer, then reviewed in turn by a division engineer, if the local engineer is of the rank of major or below, then passed upon by the Board of Engineers, and finally reviewed by the Chief of Engineers. It is perfectly evident that some benefit would be derived from the variety of judgment obtained by having successive boards or persons consider a project, but the Corps of Engineers, like any organization of that kind, have their general standards. They concur as far as possible in the opinions of each other. Sometimes, it is true, a local engineer favors a project, the division engineer disapproves it, the Board of Engineers may overrule the division engineer and sustain the local engineer, or vice versa, and when the project comes to the Chief of Engineers he may express an opinion different from that of any of those who have preceded him, either the local engineer, the division engineer, or the board of review, though this is most infrequent. But the whole corps naturally, and I think it may be said that it is their duty, seek to maintain general standards and methods, and they endeavor to make those standards and methods conform to the law as enacted by Congress.

I do think that a board to review this whole question would be helpful. As I understand it, the Senator from North Carolina cordially acquiesced in an amendment for a new board, composed of several members of the Cabinet, two Members of the House, and two Members of the Senate, to look over this entire subject. Such an amendment was proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I have grave doubts whether that board would do any good; but if it should consider this subject of navigation and related subjects, valuable suggestions would be made. I repeat to the Senator from North Carolina, however, that the path to reform is for Congress to exercise some restraint; for Congress to emphatically declare that it does not approve these wasteful items and these injudicious methods.

It is for us to ignore local considerations, to forget that we are Senators from a State and realize that we are Senators of the United States. It is for the Members of the House to ignore, while the river and harbor bill is pending, the fact that they represent a district in which there is Muddy Creek or Podunk Creek or Cheesequake Creek. We represent the whole Nation, and our duty is to frame a river and harbor bill which shall be national in its scope and which shall be drawn for the benefit of the whole people.

When we have done that there will not be any need of overhauling the Board of Review or the Engineering Corps. It is not for us to censure them for what they have done when it is so evident that in these river and harbor bills appropriations threaten to run riot, where Congress includes a class of items that never ought to come into a river and harbor bill, that never ought to receive the recognition of the Federal Government because they are local in their nature and because in many instances they confer very little benefit even on a limited locality.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he feels that we have reached the stage of Utopian perfection which he has so vigorously described?

Mr. BURTON. It is not Utopian; it is just good common business sense.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is so idealistic, however, that while this Government has been running for upward of 100 years the plans which the Senator from Ohio defines with so much skill and sincerity have failed to find practical application in the affairs of our Government.

Mr. BURTON. I do not agree with the Senator. I think there is no Republic in the world where there is a larger degree of patriotism or in which, when the attention of the people is aroused, there is a mightier spirit speaking for the Nation and against the mere representation of an individual interest or even an individual district or State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President; but the Senator from Ohio, to give practical effect to his suggestion, would be obliged to select arbitrarily, without any reference whatsoever to local considerations or conditions, certain plans that were large and supposed to be of national importance, and then seek the approval of Congress for such a scheme. I think that is a very remote possibility.

Mr. BURTON. If it is remote, we ought to abdicate. We ought to say, "We failed on this class of legislation, and we will either abandon the system entirely or we will turn it over to an executive board."

The Senator from Michigan knows, and every Member of the Senate who has been so kind as to listen to me in past years knows, that I have not looked with favor on the plan, advocated by many men of ability and influence, of turning over river and harbor improvements to a board for their control and management, and the apportionment of amounts expended by them. I have said that such a task is a legislative function. If, however, we have come to the point where we can not attend to this in a businesslike manner and make appropriations judiciously; if our course is not national but sectional, if it is not for the good of all the people, but rather for the supposed benefit of a few, it is a proof and a confession of failure, and we ought to change our methods.

I am perfectly frank to say that I am much more reconciled to the idea of a commission than I was formerly. Every recent river and harbor bill has been an object lesson in which it has been written, in letters so large that everyone who studies may read, that we are making mistakes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BURTON. In just a moment. We are subjecting ourselves to the accusation, now so frequent throughout the country, that this whole bill is a "pork barrel." The Senator from North Carolina knows that in past years at least nobody sought to defend this bill more earnestly than I have; but in this year, 1914, it has come to a pass where I can not defend it; and, more than that, I feel that if I did not condemn it and seek to point out its defects I should be failing in my duty to the Senate and to my State and to that larger constituency, which includes the whole country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I will yield first to the Senator from North Carolina and then I will yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan, if the Senator from Ohio is willing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The disposition to characterize this bill as a "pork barrel,' I think, is rather a hasty and inappropriate designation. If it is a pork barrel, that is an impeachment of the Engineer Corps of our Army, whose members hold no political position, who live in no local community, and who serve the Nation as a whole. If it is a pork barrel, then the Engineer Corps of the Army have been assailed, for the absolute, unblushing truth about this bill is that nineteen-twentieths of it comes with a favorable report from the engineers of the Army.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I am not going to dwell on the accusation that this bill is a "pork barrel." Far be it from me to use that term; but if somebody should use that term, and select certain items in this bill and put it up to me to defend the bill and contradict them, I would rather assign the task to somebody else. The argument of the Senator from Michigan, carried to its logical conclusion, means that we ought to leave the whole bill to the Board of Engineers. Would the Senator from Michigan favor that method?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President, because that would be an abdication of our legislative function. I think the engineers may be appropriately called in to advise the legislative department of the Government as to the practicability of a river or harbor improvement; but as to the policy of a river and harbor improvement, I think that should be determined by Congress.

I rejoice that men who represent local communities, and who are here, a part of this great legislative branch of the Government, come with a first-hand knowledge of the necessities of those communities, and can make them manifest upon the floor of either House of Congress. When this is not done you have an autocratic system of government which is not representative in its character and which loses all the elements of a true democracy. I would not advocate such a principle of government under any conditions.

I glory in the fact that men come from Peachtree Creek and have Peachtree Creek at heart. When, one day, from the other side of the Chamber there came a sharp criticism of an appropriation for a little, inconsequential creek in New Jersey, I rejoiced that the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], with all his experience and with all his knowledge of improved waterways and the necessity therefor, sprang instantly to the relief of that little creek in New Jersey.

Now, we are not all so fortunate as to be so familiar with these creeks as the Senator from Ohio is, and we are not all so fortunate as to have him sustain us in our efforts to attract the attention of the General Government to the wisdom of the local appropriations; but under our system of government the Representative and the Senator may do it, and they have a perfect right to do it.

Mr. BURTON. What was that creek—Raccoon Creek, as against the Arkansas River?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it was Raccoon Creek. A great deal of fault was found about it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. There was much jesting at the expense of Raccoon Creek and the Kill von Kull. It was my privilege to state here in the Senate that this much-jeered-at Kill von Kull carried a tonnage over three times the amount of that which passes through the Suez Canal. Now, there are perhaps instances where money is illy expended; but I do say, generally speaking, that value has come from these appropriations.

Cheesequake Creek was mentioned here, also. I recall very well many years ago when the Hon. Miles Ross was a Representative in the House, and the question of Cheesequake Creek was brought up, and it was laid on and jested about until it had the effect of defeating Miles Ross; and yet the fact is that that insignificant and somewhat ridiculously named Cheesequake Creek carried a tonnage both startling and immense, and it has grown each year through the facility that has been added through the munificence of the Government of the United States in improving it. We have a myriad of them; and while I am willing to admit that there may be some instances where the appropriations are not justified, I know of no case in New Jersey where the money has been illy or unwisely spent. New Jersey is the very gateway of the Nation's commerce, and many of our creeks and waterways are fairly alive with trade and commerce. Improved waterways will do much to solve the problem of high cost of living.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not wish to defend Cheesequake Creek, but I will take up the more opprobrious task of defending Raccoon Creek. Some years ago a Senator from one of the States west of the Mississippi River called attention to the neglect in the improvement of the Arkansas River, and complained very bitterly, and in order to give point and lend effectiveness to his argument he spoke in terms of ridicule of Raccoon Creek. I had the statistics near at hand—or possibly I remembered them then, though I do not have them exactly in mind now—which showed that, while between two and three million dollars had been spent on the Arkansas River, and less than a hundred thousand dollars had been spent upon Raccoon Creek, nevertheless Raccoon Creek had more than twice as much commerce as the whole Arkansas River.

Mr. KENYON. Was that mostly fur?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no. There are no raccoons there nowadays. I presume it is a very old name; but that shows that in many instances these small streams having names which do not altogether commend them to the public attention, streams which are unknown to fame, may nevertheless have a very respectable amount of commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Michigan while it is fresh in my mind.

As to the argument of the Senator from Michigan, it seems to me he must grasp one horn or the other of the dilemma. Either he must be willing to leave all these appropriations to the Engineer Corps—and I am not sure but that would be a very great improvement on present methods—or if he insists that the policy must be determined by Congress, and appropriations also determined by Congress, he must relieve the Engineer Corps alike from obloquy and responsibility for this bill.

I think it is no reflection on the Engineer Corps when we criticize this measure. I have repeated over and over again my views about that matter—that the Engineer Corps seek to do what Congress wishes them to do. If there is fault, if there is mistaken policy, it is our fault; it is our mistaken policy, and not that of the engineers, because they regard themselves as our servants.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I am not annoying the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. BURTON. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio what proportion of the bill now before the Senate bears the approval of the Engineer Corps of the Army?

Mr. BURTON. A very considerable majority of it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not nineteen-twentieths of the present bill?

Mr. BURTON. I hardly think as much as that, when you come to amounts; certainly not when you come to amounts appropriated in this bill, and that which is in prospect if this bill should be passed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have been diverted from my line of inquiry——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Who has been recognized, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No one yet.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I thought. I do not get up and then proceed until I am recognized. I simply want the Chair to recognize some one, and then I will submit.

Mr. BURTON. I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is not in the power of the Senator from Ohio to do that. It is for the Chair to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he yields; and if so, to whom.

Mr. SIMMONS. I addressed the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know; and then the Senator proceeded to take the floor without any further proceeding by the Chair. I am quite modest myself about jumping into a discussion when another Senator holds the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not excusing myself, but I will say that I had done my part. I had addressed the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator was not backward about going forward. He did his part.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I address the Chair again.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Several Senators have addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Ohio will leave it to the Chair as to the Senator who should be recognized, if that is regular.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, that is not regular. It is for the Senator to state to whom he yields.

Mr. BURTON. Then I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Ohio engaged in the colloquy with the Senator from Michigan I had not quite finished the line of inquiry that I wished to make, and an inquiry that I am making in the utmost good faith. I had inquired of the Senator whether he meant to attack the Board of Engineers, and I understood him to say he did not. I inquired of the Senator whether he would supplement the Board of Engineers, and the Senator has not told me in what way he would do it, except to say that an amendment was offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] which, if I remember correctly, is a coordination proposition largely. The Senator does not, therefore, attack the competency or the motives of the Board of Engineers and of the Chief of Engineers, and the Senator does not suggest——

Mr. BURTON. I may criticize their judgment, but once again, and for the twelfth time, allow me to suggest——

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the Senator any additional method of obtaining more accurate and more satisfactory results as a basis for congressional action?

Mr. BURTON. I will say frankly I would rather not answer that question until we find out, upon the discussion of this bill, what the Senate is going to do. If the Senate shows a disposition to reform, that will cure the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator does not now suggest any additional board. Now let me ask the Senator, Does the Senator criticize the board upon the ground that it has yielded to outside pressure and congressional influence and the influence of various and sundry bodies and individuals as might come before it for the purpose of presenting their views and presenting facts with reference to the commerce of the stream proposed to be improved and with reference to the general public benefits to be derived from the improvement of the stream? Do I understand that the Senator is making the contention that it is improper for the Board of Engineers to invite commercial bodies, to invite individuals in the community where the river is located, to come before it for the purpose of giving testimony as to the advisability of the project and as to the commerce, and so on, that was there actually or would be there prospectively?

Mr. BURTON. No; I do not. In this country of ours the greatest liberality is extended to persons who wish to be heard. However, in these cases I should advise the very greatest scrutiny of the arguments advanced. I recall one instance in our reports in which an association sent in statistics of the traffic, and these statistics thus furnished were found to be just ten times greater than what they actually were, and it is my idea that occasionally the members of the board are misled. I do think it would be better for Members of the Senate and of the House to leave that board alone.

I had some part in the organization of the body in 1902. I have never appeared before them except once, and that was recently, and rather with a view to obtaining information or of introducing a delegation than for any other purpose. I rather regretted to do that. I think in the earlier years of their work it was an infrequent thing for Members of the Senate or House to appear before them.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator knows that whenever a project is presented to that board and the board are in any doubt about the wisdom of approving it from a commercial standpoint, it is the habit of the board to send out notices to Members of Congress—notices to local people that the board have reason to feel take an interest in the project or have knowledge of the project—to come before them and give testimony. The Senator knows that in nearly all those cases the witnesses do come—sometimes boards of trade, sometimes merchants, or shippers, or farmers, as the case may be. They go before the board and give testimony; they are subject to cross-examination; and in many cases the board brings together with their action upon that project the testimony taken before them with reference to it. Does not the Senator believe that that is a good practice and that it tends to enlighten the board with respect to certain matters with regard to which it ought to have information and in regard to which Congress would like to have information?

Mr. BURTON. That in a large degree depends upon the extent to which the board accepts those statements. I find, on the other hand, that when there is a movement looking to conservatism here in the Senate or elsewhere, there is no board of trade, there is no boosters' club, there is no press bureau, there is no paid association to urge economy and a judicious selection of public works, and the man who stands in the Senate or House for those contentions must expect to be attacked all along the line.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. BURTON. I submit it is not quite fair to those who criticize these appropriations to be subjected to such overwhelming odds. I suggest that it is hardly fair to that great general public which pays this expense, upon whom the burden of taxation must be imposed, to have all the arguments and all the solicitation and all the pressure on the side of those who favor with none on the part of those who are against such projects.

It is a part of the condition of the times. If you set a few who seek the best government and real economy, or if you set the multitude, who are engaged in earning their living, against those who are coming here to get something from the United States Government, especially an appropriation, the insistence of the latter and their organization make that great general body who are going about their business as powerless in opposition as a scattered mob is against an organized body of policemen or soldiers.

The Senate has the responsibility of scrutinizing these arguments of the boards of trade and similar bodies, and I will try to point out to the Senate whether some of them are correct or not. I will try to show whether their figures are accurate. I think in some cases the Board of Engineers have been misled by arguments of this kind.

Then I want to show another thing. When you send a body of men out into a State or to a city where they are in an atmosphere surcharged with the demand for a public improvement, it is not necessary for me to more than briefly repeat with what they are confronted—associations, booming clubs, boards of trade, a sentiment which favors an improvement, probably banquets, though I do not believe the members would yield to that. They are put in an atmosphere——

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator know that there has ever been any such influence as he has just intimated brought to bear to influence the board in any instance?

Mr. BURTON. I can answer that question very briefly by saying that in numerous cases, I do not say they have been influenced, but, at least, the environment creates an atmosphere of congeniality and friendship to the demands of the locality. I have myself attended banquets when at 9 o'clock the banqueters believed in a channel 10 feet deep; at 10 o'clock they believed in one 20 feet deep; and when it got along toward the hour of midnight they believed that the channel ought to be dredged to 40 feet.

Mr. SIMMONS. Was that banquet given to the Senator from Ohio when he was chairman of the committee in the House or was it given to the Board of Engineers?

Mr. BURTON. Not to the Board of Engineers, but we who have been through something of the same experience can imagine the effect. Really I do not say these entertainments influence anybody, but philosophers and others use the term "atmosphere." Hospitality and attention creates an atmosphere which possibly obscures in some degree the judgment. I can myself recall being in localities where the pressure was almost overwhelming in behalf of an improvement; notes of patriotism were raised, the Panama Canal was going to be useless unless some little channel was improved, "and you ought to be mighty quick about it, too. If you do not finish this before the time when the Panama Canal is finished, the commerce of the country will suffer."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. Pardon me a moment. The Senator from North Carolina knows one can not go through all that sort of experience without a feeling that everybody is in favor of this improvement. If there was a man who was against it in one of those communities while they were visiting, who would raise his voice, they would take him out and duck him under the pump. Nobody would dare to speak anything in opposition to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is now speaking, I understand, about business people; he is not speaking about the Board of Engineers. I was speaking about the Board of Engineers. The Board of Engineers hold their meetings here in Washington, and the witnesses come before them at their rooms in Washington. As a rule, I think they seldom ever know of any of these gentlemen except as they offer themselves as witnesses.

Mr. BURTON. Or unless their Representatives or Senators ask that they be heard.

Mr. SIMMONS. Or unless they introduce them.

Mr. BURTON. Or the Representative or Senator asks to be heard himself.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator does not think there is anything wrong in a Senator or Representative taking his constituents before this body any more than it would be wrong for him to accompany witnesses to any other hearing that might be going on before any public department of the Government.

But the point I was getting at is this: The Senator knows that these witnesses come there; he knows that their testimony is taken; he knows that it is taken down; and he knows that the Board of Engineers give weight to it just as their judgment may dictate that it is worthy of consideration. The Senator knows, I think, that while they very frequently decide in accordance with the wishes of the delegations and the witnesses that come before them they very frequently decide against them just as any other court or tribunal does. I think if the Senator will take the records and investigate them he will find that more delegations who have come here and appeared before the Board of Engineers in the interest of projects in their States finally are disappointed in the result of the findings of that board than are satisfied with the findings of the board. I am sure that that has been the experience of the delegations that came from my State.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. If I may just answer that, the proportion of projects rejected is much less than it was formerly. I do not think it is at all correct to say that more of those delegations are disappointed than those who are pleased or favored. In the last several years the large majority of the projects that are approved by the Board of Engineers and the Chief of Engineers are adopted. It has become almost a matter of detail just as soon as a project is approved to include it in the bill, or if the bill has already been loaded pretty heavily, it may be, to say "we can not put it on until the next bill."

Now, in regard to the projects favorably reported, although it was thought 10 years ago, or 7 or 8 years ago, that we had swept the whole country with a fine-tooth comb and picked out everything for a survey that was worthy of a survey, these later projects are those of which no one thought in 1909 and 1910 and 1911, and which are presumably much less desirable. Some, it is true, are enlargements of old projects, where better facilities are required. A larger share of them are now approved than was formerly the case. I remember one time when a batch of surveys came in—53 in number—and where there were unfavorable reports on 51 by the Board of Review. They have made no such record as that in recent years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not speak authoritatively about the proportion which are approved and the proportion which are disapproved, but I know that, like any other tribunal hearing testimony, they decide one way and the other. I think if you were to measure their reports or count them you would find that probably they decide just about as often against a project as they decide for a project.

But the Senator was criticizing the findings of the board, and I was calling his attention to the method by which they get such additional information to that furnished by the local engineers and district engineers as they may want for the purpose of rendering a satisfactory decision, and that that method is by soliciting people to come before them who could throw light upon the question. Now, having gotten this information, having decided a case unafavorably, we never hear of it again probably until there is another survey ordered. If they have decided it unfavorably, then it comes up to Congress, but along with it comes the testimony taken before the Board of Engineers, together with the statement of the district officer who examined it in the first instance and the division officer who reviewed his action.

Now, the Senator does not mean to say that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the House and the Committee on Commerce in the Senate exercised no judgment with reference to those projects. Surely he does not mean to say that we put in the bill every single item that comes with a favorable report from the engineers.

Mr. BURTON. How many can the Senator from North Carolina name of those that have been before the Committee on Commerce of the Senate with favorable reports that were rejected?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can say to the Senator that just at this minute I can not name any particular one; but I do know, as a matter of fact, that a great many have been approved by the board that were not incorporated in this bill; and the Senator knows that to be the fact.

Mr. BURTON. The number is becoming smaller and smaller year by year.

Mr. SIMMONS. That may be true, but, Mr. President, the point I am making, and I ask the Senator if I am not correct, is that this board is composed, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has said, of men who are not politicians, men who are beyond and above political influence if any class of people in this Government are above political influence. They hold their offices for life, or during good behavior. You probably could not select therefor a more impartial body of men, and I think the Senator will agree with me you could not select a more intelligent and competent set of men.

If the Senator has any reason to believe that that body has been improperly influenced by the outside testimony that they themselves have invited or that has come voluntarily before them, I think the Senator ought to bring the circumstances showing the situation to the Senate, and without doing that he leaves, by implication at least, quite an imputation upon these Army officers.

I want to say frankly I have had a good deal of experience with this board. I have been there, and I intend to continue to go there. I do not think it is improper for a Senator or a Representative to appear before a board of engineers i behalf of a project in his State that he has confidence in. I do not think the Senator would say that I or any other Senator on this floor would appear before them in behalf of any project for purely political reasons unless it met with the approval of our judgment. I have been there, and I have never up to this time had the slightest reason to believe that they considered a project and the testimony presented in its behalf otherwise than as an impartial tribunal looking to the public welfare.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not say that they have been improperly influenced. I have repeatedly spoken of them as the blue ribbon of the Government service, men holding their positions for life, enjoying the traditions of an organization which has been honorable from the very earliest day, including such men as Robert E. Lee and George Gordon Meade and others among the brightest stars in the military history of the United States. What I do say is that duties are imposed upon them under which they hear from boomers and boosters and do not hear from the great body of the American public.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. But I should like to continue a little further. What I do say is that they have been overruled by Congress. There was a case down here on the coast of Texas where they reported against what seems to me an utterly foolish proposition, carrying the waters of the Gulf up through a pass and by a canal around a lake and then up a couple of rivers into the interior and seeking to make seaports of two cities. The man who has the slightest comprehension of a seaport knows that you can not create it in a narrow river. A seaport must have room for anchorage. Vessels come in and wait days, even weeks, to be loaded. There must be ample space to turn around. If it is to assume any importance there must be a large area of water around which wharves and docks can be erected. To my mind it was a perfectly absurd proposition. The engineers turned it down. They were attacked on the floor for their report. It was said, "Oh, you may understand engineering, but you do not know anything about commerce," and it was sent back to them with practically a demand that they report in favor of it. Indeed, the provision was drawn in such a shape that if they had reported against it it would not have done them any good, and then Congress accepted that plan.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to inquire what has become of the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no unfinished business.

Mr. KENYON. I had understood, possibly erroneously, that the great trust bills that we are waiting for here this summer——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate displaced the trade commission bill as the unfinished business by the sundry civil bill; and, that having been disposed of, there is no unfinished business.

Mr. KENYON. I was under the impression that the trade commission bill had been laid aside temporarily.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me to make a motion?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Goff	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Burton	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Catron	James	Overman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Johnson	Page	Thomas
Clapp	Kenyon	Perkins	Thompson
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Poindexter	Townsend
Colt	Lane	Pomerene	Vardaman
Crawford	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Weeks
du Pont	McCumber	Sheppard	White
Gallinger	McLean	Simmons

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. STERLING, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. THORNTON, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names.

Mr. CHILTON, Mr. LIPPITT, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. STONE, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. REED, and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, having entered the Chamber, answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have to say with reference to that motion——

Mr. TOWNSEND. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That by an understanding with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce——

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion is not debatable, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GOFF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and therefore withhold my vote. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I do not see him in the Chamber, so I withhold my vote.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COLT (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I understand that certain Senators desire to discuss the trade commission bill this afternoon, and in view of that fact I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS. I make the point that debate is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CLAPP. I merely stated why I voted "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to inquire whether the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. DU PONT. As I have a general pair with that Senator, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (after having voted in the affirmative). I transferred my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], but I understand now that the junior Senator from Maine is paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. Therefore I transfer my pair to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who is absent on business of the Senate, and will let my vote stand.

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. KENYON. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained on account of illness. I will ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

So Mr. GALLINGER's motion was rejected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] very much for the zeal which he is showing in pressing the trade commission bill, with reference to which I am charged with responsibility on this floor, and to say that I shall be very glad of his cooperation later on in pressing the bill to a vote.

The river and harbor bill has the floor now by virtue of an understanding between myself and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]; but later on in the day, with a view to accommodating certain Senators who desire to speak upon the bill, the trade commission bill will be taken up. I will ask whether the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is present?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri does not seem to be in the Chamber at this time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Meanwhile, Mr. President, in his absence I will ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on the trade commission bill and all pending amendments on Monday next.

Mr. JAMES. At what hour?

Mr. NEWLANDS. At the hour of 4 o'clock.

Mr. LIPPITT. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection; so that there is no necessity to call the roll to disclose the presence of a quorum.

Mr. JAMES. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island would agree on some other day.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he is willing to name a day for a vote?

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say, in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Nevada, that my own belief upon the subject is that we should not come to a final decision upon the trade commission bill until all the legislation connected with the subject of trusts which the President and his advisers propose to have brought before Congress is here, so that we can vote upon every part of it in connection with its relation to every other part.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state, Mr. President, that conferences are being held between the members of the Judiciary Committee and the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee with reference to the pending trust legislation, and that these conferences are attended, of course, with beneficial results. It is for that reason that I have not urged strenuously the consideration of the trade commission bill by the Senate. I am told that there will be a report from the Judiciary Committee before next Monday, and that was the reason I urged the fixing of a time for voting upon the trade commission bill upon that day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I appreciate the feeling of the Senator from Nevada, and accept his congratulations on the zeal that I have manifested toward getting the so-called trade commission bill before the Senate. I have not brought myself as yet to believe that the trade commission bill is a good bill, but I have brought myself to believe that the river and harbor bill is a very bad bill, so that I am simply deciding as between a manifestly bad measure and a measure that may possibly have enough good in it to command my vote later on. But I have had an impression from what I have heard and what I have read that there was great urgency to take up the trust bills, which, if they did not emanate outside of Congress, have certainly been urged outside of Congress by a very potential force.

It is possible that the Senator from Nevada thinks that Washington is a pleasant summer resort, and that we had better stay here until the beginning of the next session, as we did last year. I can stay as well as others; but, for my part, whatever may be the fate of the trade commission bill and the other bills which are to accompany it, I think we ought to proceed to consider them and dispose of them in some reasonable time.

As to the river and harbor bill, I hope it never will be voted on favorably, because it has so many objectionable items in it that, unless it is practically emasculated and amended to an extent that I apprehend it will be impossible to amend it, I hope it will be defeated, and I shall do what I can properly to bring about that result. I shall vote to take up any bill that has any features in it that commend themselves to me for the purpose of delaying the consideration and the vote upon the river and harbor bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I only want to observe that it is a matter of some surprise to me that the Senator from Nevada should assist in any way in the passage of the river and harbor bill. I had supposed that we were here this summer in this delightful climate to consider trust bills; the country has been so advised; and the trade commission bill has been before the Senate for some time. It apparently now is to give place to the river and harbor bill; in other words, the river and harbor bill, which is condemned by very many people in this country, is now to have precedence over the real, the great business for which we are assembled.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if, in the natural logical sequence of things, we ought not to have the avenues of trade open in order that we may have trade to regulate before we create a commission to regulate the trade? I think there is some force in the position of the Senator from Nevada. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENYON. Of course, if the trade is to be by water, the river and harbor bill will not help it much. [Laughter.]

When the river and harbor bill was before the Senate in 1913 the Senator from Nevada offered a few observations, to which I wish to refer for just a moment. I do not want to delay matters, of course, but this is very good reading. He said:

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say, Mr. President, that the remark I was making did not involve criticism of the Senator from Ohio. I was about to add that the system of river and harbor improvements pursued under his guidance in the House of Representatives was vastly improved. When he took hold of the leadership of this subject there a system prevailed called the "pork-barrel" system, a system with which we are all familiar, and which it is unnecessary to describe.

We had the pork barrel in projects just as we had it in offices, and the aim of thoughtful men was to substitute the merit system, both in projects and offices.

Again, further down in that speech, which was rather a condemnation of the system of river and harbor appropriations——

Mr. GALLINGER. In what year was that, I ask the Senator?

Mr. KENYON. In 1913. I am reading from the RECORD of February 20, 1913. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] further said:

But in the very nature of things the great enterprise of developing a river for navigation can not be successfully pursued unless there is a single power or a combination of the various powers having jurisdiction, and unless the development of the river can be so planned and executed that the various uses of the river, including the works necessary to develop such uses, dovetail into each other.

That is what we are contending for. The Senator from Nevada continued:

So river improvement has broken down. It is to-day ineffectual for the purpose which Congress has in view in the exercise of its interstate-commerce power, namely, the promotion of navigation. It has been just as ineffectual in the development of a complete waterway as the action of a railroad company would be in the construction o. a railway in detached portions here and there, a stretch of 10 miles here and a stretch of 10 miles there, without any connection between the various structures.

Again, a little further in the speech, the Senator from Nevada said:

So throughout the years we have been going along with this ineffectual method of taking up individual projects here and there as a part of the spoils system, without comprehensive plans involving the union of all the services in the country that relate to water and involving the union of all the sovereignties that have jurisdiction over the subject.

Mr. President, I listened to this speech then with great interest. I had only been in the Senate a short time, and the able address of the Senator at that time is one reason, I think, why I have given some study to the river and harbor question. I hope the Senator from Nevada is not willing that the great trust measures shall be laid aside in order to consider and pass a bill the principles of which he has condemned time and time again. If we are now presented with the spectacle of the Democratic Party laying aside the trust measure in order to pass this appropriation bill, which carries many meritorious projects, it is true, but also many projects that ought to be stricken out—if that is the idea, I want to invite attention for just a few moments to one or two platforms of the Democratic Party. I do not wish to create any riot by referring to the Democratic platforms. I may have to refer to the Baltimore platform later, but in 1904 the Democratic Party in convention assembled declared:

Large reductions can easily be made in the annual expenditures of the Government without impairing the efficiency of any branch of the public service, and we shall insist upon the strictest economy and frugality.

In 1908 the Democratic Party said in their platform.

The Republican Congress in the session just ended made appropriations amounting to $1,008,000,000, exceeding the total expenditures of the past fiscal year by $90,000,000, and leaving a deficit of more than $60,000,000 for the fiscal year just ended. We denounce the needless waste of the people's money, which has resulted in the appalling increase.

In 1912—and I refer to that platform with some hesitancy—the Democratic Party declared:

We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil.

Mr. President, some of us have felt that there were things in the river and harbor bill that should be defeated and that we would be justified in resorting to every means possible under the rules of the Senate to defeat that bill; but if there is to be some kind of cooperation, if the river and harbor bill is more important than the trust bills, then I suppose the cohesive power of these differentiated appropriations will make it impossible to defeat the bill. However, with the views of the Senator from Nevada as to river and harbor bills and the iniquities they contain, I simply appeal to him not to assist in narrowing the discussion of the river and harbor bill or precipitating any hasty action thereon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, in the first place, I disclaim any disposition to slow up the progress of the trade commission bill. I have repeatedly urged the fixing of a day for a vote upon that measure. In the progress of the debate some question has arisen as to the legal meaning of the words "unfair competition." Those words have been the subject of serious reflection by members of the Judiciary Committee. Members of the Interstate Commerce Committee are confident that those words not only have a legal significance which will be recognized, but have an elastic significance to enable the term to reach all cases that the law ought to reach. We have, however, no pride of opinion upon the subject, and we are grateful to the members of the Judiciary Committee who are giving serious consideration to this question, and some of the members of that committee have asked me to delay the consideration of this measure until they could come to some conclusion regarding that term.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I prefer to go along and make my statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I merely wanted to ask the Senator about his reference to the Judiciary Committee; I did not understand it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not, however, willing to delay unduly the consideration of this bill with a view to consultation with the members of the Judiciary Committee. I may say that the members of that committee have been in consultation with some of the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee concerning certain provisions of the Clayton bill, with a view to harmony of action. I am not, however, disposed to delay; and I believe we can come to a vote, and ought to come to a vote, on Monday. I have asked unanimous consent, and a Senator on the other side objects.

Mr. President, I am very appreciative of the support which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] are giving to the trade commission bill, and I am very glad that they manifest a disposition to put it ahead of the river and harbor bill. I think its importance demands prior consideration; but under the rules of the Senate the appropriation bills have the right of way. I have been obliged to yield and have been ready to yield to the consideration of such a bill as the sundry civil bill, which involves appropriations for the entire Government, with reference to which existing appropriations extend only to the 15th day of July. So, also, with reference to the river and harbor bill; for I have no doubt that bill will be enacted at this session, and I believe it ought to be enacted, and I will give my reasons.

The Senator from Iowa has referred to some utterances of mine in the past, critical of the methods employed in making appropriations for rivers and harbors. I stand by those utterances. They were true then, and they are true to-day; but I never thought it wise to abandon every form of appropriation for rivers and harbors without substituting some other system which could take up the current work and carry it on to completion. I never contemplated such radical or revolutionary action; and I believe it would be radical and revolutionary to defeat the present river and harbor bill without substituting immediately some system that would take its place, so that the current work could go on.

Progress is being made upon the lines of reform which I have been urging and which are represented in a bill which I have been pressing for many years, called the river regulation bill. At the last Congress the Senate put upon the river and harbor bill an amendment providing practically for the skeleton organization of the general bill which I had introduced. That was accepted by the Senate, and was stricken out because of the failure of the House conferees to agree to it. At this session a similar amendment introduced by me was put upon this bill by the committee itself, and it was put there upon my motion, the committee acting after full consideration of this subject by a Cabinet committee consisting of the Secretaries of War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce, who were requested by the President to look into this whole question and to give him their advice regarding this important subject; and as a result of their advice this amendment is being pressed. It has been the subject of Cabinet consideration and has the approval of the President himself, so it may be regarded as a recommendation from the President of the United States.

I believe, therefore, that we are making substantial progress, and I would not feel warranted in defeating appropriations for every harbor in the United States. There is no criticism, as a rule, of the harbor development that has taken place, and there are large appropriations in this bill—probably one-third or possibly one-half—for the harbors of the country. Would we end the work that is now going on in these harbors in order to work out and substitute hereafter what we conceive to be a better system of conducting the work on rivers and harbors? It seems to me that would be great folly.

So also with reference to the rivers of the country. No one can complain of the development that is going on upon the Ohio River. That development is a logical development, the result of the study and experience of years, and is upon the highest lines of scientific achievement. Shall we stop that because we disapprove the general system under which this work is being done?

So, also, with reference to the Mississippi River. This bill carries seven or eight million dollars, I believe, for the protection of the banks and the construction of levees upon the Mississippi River. Shall we stop that work and subject that entire region to the risk of an overflow and the consequent destruction, in order to hurry the way toward a more nearly perfect system in the future? It seems to me that we are unprepared to take that risk. So while there are items in this bill of which perhaps we as individuals would disapprove, we certainly would be taking a great risk in refusing to pass this appropriation bill.

With reference to the general scheme to which I have referred, the Republican Party had an opportunity to carry that plan into accomplishment, and it lost the opportunity. The general principles of that plan were practically maintained by two waterway commissions, and yet no substantial progress was made under either Mr. Roosevelt's administration or Mr. Taft's administration toward the successful accomplishment of this reform. The system is a very simple one. It involves not only work upon the lower reaches of the river in the shape of channel improvements, bank protection, and levee protection, but it also involves work upon the upper reaches of our watersheds, work which will involve the seizing of the water as it falls from the heavens, slowing up its progress to the oceans and to the Gulf, and putting it to some beneficial use on the way, either in the shape of the reclamation of arid lands, or in the shape of development of water power, or in the shape of conservation of forests, or in the shape of the development of intensive cultivation, and also so controlling this water as to enable us to reclaim vast areas of swamp land, composed of an alluvial deposit unsurpassed in richness and fertility. All this is to be accomplished in such a way as to make the river, with its branches, an efficient instrumentality of commerce, perfect in every detail, with transfer facilities, with processes of coordination and cooperation with railways, in such a way as to develop a perfect system of transportation in this country, the railway system and the water system dovetailing with each other, and both in the future dovetailing with a perfected system of ocean transportation—just such a system as Germany, with her great economic foresight, has developed to such perfection.

It is a perfectly sensible thing. If we can simply slow up the waters that fall upon the immense watershed of the Mississippi—a watershed which embraces pretty nearly two-thirds of the entire area of the country—we will lower the crest of the flood at Cairo and at New Orleans, diminish the expenditures both for bank protection and for levee building, and lessen the danger to vast areas of cultivable land and towns and cities of large population and wealth.

No one can go to the city of New Orleans, as I have done, in a period of flood, and see the flood tide of that river reaching within 2 or 3 feet of the top of the levee and view the city itself, 20 or 30 feet below, protected from the deluge simply by this mass of accumulated dirt, and fail to realize the great danger to the people and to the wealth of that city. Reduce the crest of that flood 5 feet by arresting the flow of the waters above, and you will do a great service. Reduce the crest of that flood 10 feet, and you will do a greater service. Reduce it 15 feet, as can easily be accomplished, and you will relieve the entire region of danger—not only these cities but this vast cultivable area, surpassing the Valley of the Nile itself in richness and fertility, bound to be the garden spot of the entire country with a perfected waterway system, with railroads and canals running through it, canals for transportation as well as for drainage, all perfected under a scientific system such as is contemplated in the bill which I have been so long pressing.

That is all the bill involves—the simple problem of seizing hold of the water as it falls from the heavens and slowing up its progress to the ocean and to the Gulf—simply slowing it up, and meanwhile, on the way, putting it to every beneficial use in the way of intensive cultivation, the reclamation of arid lands, and the development of water power, which is a source of electric power, entering more than any other element into the daily lives of our people as a source of comfort and of wealth.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator from Nevada believe that any of these results, so salutary, so helpful to the country, will be accomplished by the river and harbor bill which is now pending before the Senate?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not so fully as under the system that I am urging; but I do claim that it would be a crime not to pass the river and harbor bill, because you would thereby imperil the entire Mississippi Valley.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator another question? Does the Senator think those objects would be accomplished at all by this bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not prepared to say that they would be; in fact, I think they will not be; but there are other things to be considered, such as the limited navigation now existing, the protection of large cultivable areas that are now protected by levees, the menace of floods to the cities, and other works of that kind. I am sure I would not willingly subject any of them to a greater strain than they have been subjected to in the past, and certainly as to the harbors we would not desire a discontinuance of work.

Mr. President, I was stating—and I shall be through in a moment—that the problem is an exceedingly simple one. It consists simply of slowing up the waters—that is all—and allowing them to be put to beneficial use, instead of allowing it to be massed for destructive uses, thus, as President Wilson so aptly said, turning these waters from a menace into a blessing.

I should be glad to see the river regulation bill which I have been urging substituted for this river and harbor bill, with the total appropriation provided for in this river and harbor bill subjected to the judgment of the commission organized under it; but there is no hope of passing such a measure. I have no doubt the $50,000,000 and more carried in this bill would be more effectively spent under the system of coordination of the scientific services of the National Government provided for by the river regulation bill and under the system of cooperation between the Nation and the States provided for by that bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If anyone upon the other side will move for the substitution of that river regulation bill, with the appropriation contained in this bill, I am sure I should be glad to vote for it. Would the Senator from Ohio be ready to vote for it?

Mr. BURTON. I am not sure but that I would as against this river and harbor bill. I should want to examine into that somewhat.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish the Senator from Iowa were here. I should like to ask him that question. Would the Senator from New Hampshire vote for the substitution of the river regulation bill for this bill, with the appropriation provided for by this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nevada has rather cooled any ardor I might have had in that direction by saying that it can not be done.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It can not be done?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what the Senator from Nevada said.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am now looking for votes.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it can not be done, what is the good of trying?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I begin to be hopeful when the Senator from Ohio indicates that he may be prepared to vote for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will further answer the Senator by saying that while I have not examined the bill very carefully, as at present advised, I would vote for it in preference to this bill. I say that as at present advised.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, that indicates how this revolution is going on in public sentiment. The Senator from New Hampshire will recall that I served with him upon the Commerce Committee, and the Senator probably will recall that as I represented a State that had no navigable rivers and no harbors, my sole purpose in being upon that committee was to urge this particular measure. I can not say the Senator opposed it. His mind is always open; and I recall that when he was passing the Appalachian bill—a bill for the condemnation of forests with a view to the regulation of navigation, recollect—the Senator expressed himself then as entertaining hospitality toward the views which I was presenting. It has taken five or six years, however, to bring the Senator to a point where he is willing to vote for such a measure. Am I not justified, therefore, in saying that I think it would be difficult to substitute the river regulation bill for the pending bill at this moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have never had an opportunity to vote for it. The Senator has either been guilty of laches, or he has met with so much opposition from other quarters that the bill has never been before the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have never been able to get it out of committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; so I could not have voted for it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate in the discussion of this bill. Some time later on in debate, when the amendment which I have proposed to this bill comes up for consideration—an amendment which has been adopted by the committee—it will give me pleasure to say something upon this subject, and to supplement the labors of the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from New Hampshire, and the Senator from Iowa in creating the foundation, at least, of this rational system of handling the waters which fall from the clouds upon these vast watersheds in such a way as to turn them from a menace into a blessing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I was interested to hear the Senator from Nevada say that he had not permanently abandoned the trade commission bill, but that he is simply applying to it the slowing-up process which he thinks might be applied with profit to the waters of the country. The Senator made a suggestion, however, which I did not quite understand. I rose to interrupt him, to ask for an explanation, but the Senator did not yield to me.

Did I understand the Senator to say that the Judiciary Committee was now considering the feature of the trade commission bill relating to unfair competition?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not say that I am informed as to whether the Judiciary Committee, as a committee, is considering it or not; but I know it has been the subject of very serious consideration by a number of the members of that committee who have spoken to me regarding it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was a little curious to know why the activities of the Senator had been checked by the investigations of the Judiciary Committee with reference to this matter, when a few days ago the Senator declined to accede to the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] for a postponement of the consideration of the bill, owing to the fact that the Judiciary Committee was then considering some proposed amendments to the trade commission bill, which amendments had been directly referred to that committee. This particular matter of unfair competition certainly has not been referred to the committee. I never have heard of it. I am curious to understand, however, why the Senator should be willing to lay aside his bill to enable the Judiciary Committee to consider this bill when he declined rather peremptorily the other day to permit it to be laid aside to consider these other matters.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not recall the details of the matter to which the Senator refers. Of course I have been very urgent in pressing this bill. My recollection is that the amendments to which the Senator refers were amendments to the trade commission bill, which had been referred to the Judiciary Committee, and I understood that the action of that committee was against reporting those amendments. It has been a matter of discussion, and there was some doubt in my mind as to whether those provisions regarding interlocking directorates and holding companies should be put upon the trade commission bill; but I finally came to the conclusion—merely an individual conclusion, which is, however, in harmony with the action of the Interstate Commerce Committee—that as those subjects were dealt with in the Clayton bill, it would be best to leave them there; and thus far in my communication with members of the Judiciary Committee I have addressed myself to the question of improving and perfecting those provisions. I may say that there has been very harmonious conference between the members of that committee and the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee regarding these questions, with a view of obtaining the very best results in both bills.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator from Nevada another question? Is it the intention of the Senator to withhold further consideration of the trade commission bill until he has the opinion of the Judiciary Committee with respect to this matter of unfair competition?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I can not say that it is. I am, however, willing that the matter should be slowed up a little, with a view to getting their views. I will state that I propose very shortly to move that the trade commission bill be taken up with a view to the presentation of a speech by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and another by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah—who is a member, I believe, of the Judiciary Committee—a question for information, because I do not know the facts. Is it not a fact that the Judiciary Committee have been considering an amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, who is also a member of the Judiciary Committee, in the nature of a substitute for section 5 of the trade commission bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Judiciary Committee has been considering an amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, but I do not understand that it is a substitute for section 5 of the trade commission bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not mean, by using the word "substitute," that it is to be incorporated in this bill, but are they not considering it as a proposition which would take the place of section 5 of the trade commission bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I think not. I think it is an entirely different proposition. The amendment to which the Senator refers was introduced by the Senator from Tennessee in the Senate and has been printed, but my recollection is that it has not anything to do with the question of unfair competition.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator a further question, because I think it is well for us to know about this matter. Has the Judiciary Committee finally acted upon the amendments of the Senator from Iowa to the trade commission bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not prepared to answer that question. There was action taken upon the amendments, but whether it can be regarded as final I do not know.

Mr. SIMMONS. My recollection is that when we had this matter up several days ago, as the Senator from Iowa was about to conclude his remarks, there was some suggestion on the part of the Senator from Nevada that we proceed to a vote, and I think it was then stated—I do not remember whether by the Senator from Iowa or some one else—that he had certain amendments to the bill pending before the Judiciary Committee, and there was a suggestion that we ought to await the action of that committee upon those amendments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is my impression that the amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is not able to state positively whether they have been acted upon or not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not with thorough positiveness, but I think they have. I was not present when the action was taken upon them, but I was informed that they have been disposed of.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think that final action has been taken by the Judiciary Committee upon any part of the bill that has been referred to it. Its action up to this time has been tentative. I hope the Senator from Nevada will not leave the Chamber. I have something to say that may interest him.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was not going to leave the Chamber. I was merely changing my seat.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Judiciary Committee has been, I think, very industrious, and has held its sessions both in season and out of season; but as yet I believe its work has been of a preliminary character.

What has just been said from the floor moves me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nevada, as well as to the Senator from North Carolina.

It is perfectly obvious that we are wasting a great deal of time, not intentionally but on account of the conditions which surround us. The river and harbor bill meets with determined opposition. I am opposed to it, for, I may say in passing, under the tutelage of my friend from Nevada, enlightened also by the philosophy of my friend from Ohio, I long ago came to the conclusion that I would never vote for a river and harbor bill composed upon the plan or based upon the principle exhibited and embodied in the measure now before us, although I am greatly interested in some of the projects which it seeks to develop and carry on. But, no matter what one's personal view of the bill is, it is perfectly certain that it can not be brought to a conclusion within any reasonable time.

On the other hand, the measure that has been reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee known as the trade commission bill can not, in my opinion, be brought to a conclusion as it should be, for the reason that it is a part of a program which, if not clearly defined, is yet present in the minds of all Senators, a program which involves a bill pending before the Judiciary Committee and a bill pending before the Interstate Commerce Committe not yet reported.

It seems to me that in order to consider the bill which is now before the Senate relating to the trust problem, we must have the report of the Judiciary Committee upon the bill which has been referred to it. We can neither go on with our work wisely nor can we go on with it expeditiously until that report is before us. Senators, those who speak upon the matter, must take into view the entire proposal.

Mr. LIPPITT rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me there is but one course to pursue, and that is by common consent to allow the trade commission bill to remain as it is until the Judiciary Committee reports and until the Interstate Commerce Committee reports, and to consume the intervening time not upon the river and harbor bill, because it is in constant collision with the trust program. One or the other is bound to delay or bother or vex its companion in misfortune. We ought to give these committees, the Judiciary Committee and the Interstate Commerce Committee, an opportunity, untroubled by quorum calls and votes, to conclude their work and report these bills, and then we can take up the subject for consideration. It is a mere conjecture on my part, but I believe that in less than two weeks we could reach a conclusion, a vote, upon all these measures. I believe that the Senate would at once see the high desirability of consolidating these bills in one measure if the whole subject were before the Senate. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator has almost answered the question I rose to ask him. I was going to ask him if he did not think perhaps the wise way to give those committees an opportunity to thoroughly digest this matter would be to leave the whole subject over until the Senate came together in December?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not been an advocate of postponing consideration upon the trust program until December. I readily concede that no great harm would come to the country if these measures were so postponed, but I have not stood for postponement. I have stood for action, and I am willing to stand for it now to the very end; but I would like to see intelligent action, interested action. I would like to see these bills before the Senate in a form that would command the attention of all the Senators, so that we would not be interrupted by the procedure upon the floor, going forward upon some other bill. At this very moment nearly one-half—I think that is an exaggeration, but a large number—of the Senators are absent attending meetings of committees. They are not here to help deliberate upon either the river and harbor bill or upon the trust measures; and I reiterate what I said the other day, that we are giving to the country great cause for criticism and even greater for discontent in attempting to do the public business in the way in which we are trying to do it. I yield again to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was only going to suggest to the Senator from Iowa, in view of what he has just said, and with which I thoroughly agree, that these subjects ought to have the intelligent and careful and thorough consideration of this body, if it is not going to be almost impossible under the conditions in which this body is going to work for the balance of this session to obtain any such consideration. I have for some time been very strongly of the conviction that the subject is entirely too important to be brought before a body in the condition in which the Senate is to-day and in which in all probability it will remain for the balance of the session. As we all know, we have been here for many, many months. We all know that, for various reasons, nearly every Member of the body is anxious to get away. We know that they are exhausted mentally and physically by the long continuance of the work in which they have been engaged, and that they are now brought face to face with the consideration of perhaps the most important measure that has been brought before them during the time they have been in session. Just along the line of what the Senator was speaking, for an intelligent consideration of this question, it has seemed to me that it would be very wise and do no harm to the country or to anybody if we came to these subjects in the full vigor of our understanding.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not certain whether Senators are physically and mentally sound and alert enough to enter upon this great business or not. I, however, am willing to try the experiment. I very readily concede that if when we have the program before us, through the reports of these committees, there is the same indifference to the subject that has appeared heretofore, if we can not pull ourselves together and make our minds work upon these mighty problems, then I will agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that we ought to postpone their consideration until a time when our minds will work.

Mr. BRANDEGEE rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I am not ready to concede that we can not or will not restore ourselves to or reinvest ourselves with our natural vigor and strength if we have an opportunity to do it.

I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to state at this point, while the Senator is calling attention to the number of Senators engaged elsewhere and is attempting to get the Senate to agree upon some program in relation to this subject, or this concatenated series of subjects, there are 11 Senators upon the other side of the Chamber and there are 15 Senators upon this side, making 26 Senators out of 96 who have their ears listening to what the Senator from Iowa is saying.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that proportion is very large. I think it is a subject of congratulation that we can secure 11 Senators upon the other side upon this subject at any time for any purpose except in answer to the ring of the bell which summons them here to develop a quorum. However, I do not want to arouse any feeling with regard to that.

I am sincerely desirous of seeing the trust program brought to a successful conclusion. I repeat that I hope the Senator from Nevada, who has given years of study to this subject and who is just as solicitous and just as earnest in his desire that wise legislation shall take place upon the matter as am I, will reflect upon it and see that the real obstacle against which he is now beating his strength is the fact that we have a fragment only of the subject before us, and there is a widespread and deep-seated conviction that we can not deal with it until it is all here in such bills as the committees before which they are now pending may see fit to report. Then we could go forward, and I should hope then that we might from time to time or once in a while, at any rate, secure the presence of more than 10 or 15 members of the party responsible for whatever legislation is adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I only repeat the suggestion I made a few days ago. When the time comes I intend to move to rescind the orders which have been heretofore made by the Senate allowing its committees to sit during the sessions of the Senate in violation of the fundamental parliamentary law of the civilized world and in violation of all the principles of sound legislation. But I do not care to do that so far as the river and harbor bill is concerned, because I hope we may never reach a vote upon that bill, and I do not feel called upon to facilitate its progress.

I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I quite agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa as to the desirability of having all these three bills up for consideration at once. I do not mean that they shall be considered at the same moment, but be before the Senate at the same time, because they have more or less relation to one another. But if I understand the Senator's position it is that we ought to have them, in order that they may be, so to speak, dovetailed together and consolidated in a single act of legislation. I suppose, for example, that the Senator has in mind that if we provide for a trade commission there are certain substantive provisions now in the Clayton bill that might be given over to a trade commission to deal with in some way. That is one phase.

Now, that all involves a good deal of work, and of careful work, before that can be done. Does the Senator from Iowa think that the Senate, consisting of a large number of men, is the proper body to do that work? Does the Senator think it can be done intelligently? Has the Senator taken that into consideration? Does he not think it would be better if the whole matter was submitted to a single committee to do it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, the whole subject ought to have been submitted to a single committee. These bills should all have been referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and it was a great misfortune when one of them was segregated and sent to the Judiciary Committee. I do not mean by that to imply that there are not certain things in all of them that might not be referred profitably to the Judiciary Committee, but the questions of policy involved in these three bills should have been passed upon by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, for they are all alleged regulations of interstate commerce, and that committee has been created for the purpose of considering such subjects. If after the Interstate Commerce Committee had reported upon the policy of the proposed legislation there should arise grave questions of law, if anyone should challenge the constitutionality of any particular provision, that matter could well be referred to the Judiciary Committee. But that reference would not disturb the solidarity, if you please, of the legislation brought forward by the Interstate Commerce Committee.

I will answer the other quesion of the Senator from Utah. I am not sure that all this legislation should be compounded in a single bill. I am sure, however, that all the legislation that calls into action the Federal trade commission which we, I hope, are about to create, should be in a single bill. I will specify it to the Senator from Utah. He is familiar with sections 2, 3, and 4 of the bill now before the Judiciary Committee. If they are preserved, I believe that all of them should be related to the trade commission. I think that commission could discharge a very important function with regard to them.

I refer again to sections 8 and 9, which involve or cover the subject of interlocking directorates and holding companies and the like. I think that whatever we do upon these subjects should be done in connection with the bill which creates the trade commission and clothes it with power.

Now, whether the provisions in the so-called Rayburn bill, which purport to regulate the issuance of railroad or common carrier securities, should be brought into the same measure I am not sure. My inclination is to say no; that that bill might well be an independent bill, inasmuch as it is an amendment of the interstate-commerce law and deals with the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. But we ought to have them all here, so that we could measure the extent of what is proposed and ascertain with some degree of accuracy what its effect will be upon the business of the country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I agree with what the Senator from Iowa thinks ought to be done; but let me make this suggestion about it.

In the first place, I may say that, so far as the Clayton bill is concerned, I regard some of it as bad legislation. I regard a good deal of it as unnecessary legislation, perhaps some of it that we ought to pass, but I recognize that this trade commission bill and the Clayton bill, in some form or another, are to come before the Senate for consideration, and in some form or other will probably go upon the statute books.

Now, the legislation that we pass along the lines of those two bills is going to affect the business of this country for weal or woe to a very great extent and for a long time to come, and for that reason it is legislation which ought to receive at our hands the utmost care, the most intelligent consideration, of which we are capable.

This Congress has been in session almost continuously for nearly 18 months. A portion of the time we were doing very little, it is true, but we were in session. A great many of us were here in Washington. It is no secret that a very large number of us are tired out. We are physically tired, and we are mentally weary. A very large number of the Members of this body are away. It is very difficult from day to day to maintain a quorum to do business, and then we have but a bare quorum.

Does the Senator think that it is fair to the business men of this country for the Senate, under such circumstances, to undertake to pass upon this exceedingly important legislation? Does he not think it would be better if these bills should be reported to the Senate and then, perhaps, those two bills at any rate, referred to the Judiciary Committee and the Interstate Commerce Committee jointly to consider them, to harmonize them, to dovetail them together, and bring in a report at the incoming session of Congress in December? They would have an opportunity of getting a few months' rest and then taking up the subject with freshness and vigor. The country would have an opportunity of studying the bills that will be reported.

For example, this trade commission bill that we have now before us, I venture to say, has received no study whatever at the hands of the business men of the country. A great many of them may have favored a trade commission bill, but I venture to say that many who favored a trade commission bill will not favor this bill, the provisions of which are different, in many respects, from the provisions of the House bill, and they never have received sufficient consideration—thoroughgoing consideration—at the hands of the business men of the country.

If we could carry out some such program as I have suggested, the people of the country who are interested in the subject would have an opportunity of studying it, making their views known to the Senate, to the committees of the Senate. We would come back here in December fresh and vigorous. There would be a larger attendance to take hold of the problem, to deal with it in a more thoroughgoing fashion than we can possibly do to-day. It seems to me that it is unfair to the people of our own country for us to undertake to pass legislation of such wide importance and interest and long-continued effect under these conditions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is much force in the remarks just made by the Senator from Utah, but he ought to have addressed them to the other side of the Chamber. Unfortunately or fortunately, I have nothing to do with the program, nor has this side of the Chamber very much to do with it. I have assumed for a long time that before we adjourn we are to pass legislation covering the field which I have outlined or which is outlined in these three bills, and my concern has been to be as helpful as possible in the framing of such legislation. I am not kicking against the pricks. I know that the subject must be disposed of at this session—at least I accept the decision of the caucus of our friends upon the other side, and I am not quarreling with it; I am accepting it, and I am only desirous of seeing that what is done shall be done in a wise and temperate way. I shall do everything in my power to enlist the interest of Senators when they are considering these measures, because they do touch, they do affect, more relations in the commercial life of this country than any other proposals ever made at one time. It was with that purpose in view that I rose. I know that we shall not be able to discuss the bill now before the Senate in a way in which it should be debated until the committees report upon other bills, and I hope that those who guide the affairs of the Senate, those who control the time at which we take up particular bills, the time at which we convene, and the time at which we adjourn, will give this subject their prayerful and very careful thought, so that we may be able to proceed as rapidly as possible and, at the same time, with some decent regard for the importance of the measures with which we are dealing.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it has been repeatedly intimated in the remarks and observations that have fallen from the Senators on the other side that there was some disposition on this side of the Chamber to abandon or delay the trade commission and antitrust legislation. I want to say that there has not been and is not now the slightest purpose on this side of the Chamber to delay any of these measures. The understanding under which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], in charge of the trade commission bill, and myself, in charge of the river and harbor bill, have been operating does not have that for its purpose; Senators on the other side of the Chamber know full well that it does not have that for its purpose; and when they intimate to the contrary they are simply trying to make a little political capital.

We are not pursuing an unusual course in the Senate to-day nor have we been pursuing an unusual course during the last week. When we had up the tariff bill, when we had up the currency bill, when we had up the bill for the repeal of the toll-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, carrying out the uniform custom of courtesy that has prevailed on both sides of the Chamber, we did not in the early stages of those bills insist that they should be held constantly before the Senate to the inconvenience of Senators who desired to speak on those several measures. It will be remembered that during the consideration of the tolls exemption bill, for a long period of time that bill would be put before the Senate in order to give a Senator who was ready to speak an opportunity to do so, and when he had concluded his speech, if no other Senator was ready to proceed, it was laid aside until some other Senator was ready to proceed. That proceeding went on with reference to that bill and the tariff bill and the currency bill until we had reached the stage in the consideration of those bills that it was the feeling of Senators on both sides of the Chamber that those bills should be placed before the Senate and kept before the Senate, Senators having had ample time to get ready for the discussion.

The trade commission bill, involving, as Senators have said, a vital and important question to the interests of the business of this country, has not been long before the Senate, and it is well known on this side of the Chamber, and I assume it is well known on the other side of the Chamber, that Senators who desire to speak upon it have not yet prepared themselves to speak. For one reason or another they have not been able to get ready to speak. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has desired to speak for several days, but he came before the Senate a few days ago, when it was proposed to put the measure before the body, and said that he was not at that time ready to make his speech, and asked that the bill be laid aside temporarily that he might get ready to make his remarks. There are other Senators, who are members of the Judiciary Committee, who, I understand, desire to speak upon the bill, but are not yet ready to do so.

While I can not speak for the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] with reference to this matter, I assume that the Senator from Nevada has not felt justified in placing his bill before the Senate and saying that it should remain before the Senate to the exclusion of everything else until we have reached a vote, because he desired, in accordance with the usual course and courtesy of the Senate, to accommodate Senators who desired to speak.

Senators will bear me witness that I have not at any time sought to have consideration of the river and harbor bill by the Senate when the Senator from Nevada was ready to go on with the trade commission bill. It has been stated repeatedly by him and by myself upon the floor of the Senate that I was ready at any time to yield to the Senator from Nevada when he desired to go on with his bill. Whenever I have put the river and harbor bill before the Senate and whenever I have asked the Senate to take up the bill it has been because the Senator from Nevada was not here asking that his bill be taken up.

Mr. President, I think it would be, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has said, much better in the interest of the prevention of the consumption of time if one or the other of these measures could be put before the Senate and kept before the Senate until there were action upon the measure. So far as the river and harbor bill is concerned I am ready to go on with it until there is final action, but I do not desire to displace the bill of greater importance and of greater concern to the country whenever the Senator from Nevada is ready to go on with it, and Senators on the other side know that that is the situation and that that is the condition here. I think it is very unfair for them to make an intimation that we are not pursuing our trust legislation with due and proper diligence.

Again, Mr. President, I suppose one other reason why the Senator from Nevada has not been at all times prepared to press his bill here is because it has been understood—I have myself understood it and other Senators on this side of the Chamber have understood it—that the Judiciary Committee were considering amendments to this bill and that they would soon be ready to report those amendments. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] does not deny that the committee have had under consideration the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], which, if adopted as an amendment to the antitrust bill, would largely make it unnecessary to press further section 5 in the trade commission bill. The Senator from Iowa has advised the Senate that he, too, has introduced certain amendments and that they have been referred to the Judiciary Committee. That committee is considering those amendments. The Senator from Utah does not know definitely whether they have acted upon them or not; if they have acted upon them, I have heard nothing of it, and the Senate has not been advised of their action. I suppose, if they have taken any action at all, it is tentative and that they are still considering the matter, and as soon as they reach a definite conclusion they will report that conclusion to the Senate.

In these conditions, Mr. President, whenever there has been nothing for the Senate to do because Senators are not ready to proceed with their speeches upon the trade commission bill, and because the Committee on the Judiciary have been considering amendments that will affect this bill and are not yet ready to report, the Senator from Nevada not being willing, therefore, to press his bill, I have put this other bill before the Senate. We have not made much time, it is true, but the reason we have not done so is because Senators on the other side of the Chamber are filibustering—no; I will take that back; not that side of the Chamber, for there are more than half, I am persuaded to believe, on that side of the Chamber who are in favor of the river and harbor bill—but there is a coterie there; there is a part of the membership on the other side of the Chamber who are opposed to the river and harbor bill who have been filibustering against it.

This is the first time since I have been here that I have seen on the other side of the Chamber or on this side of the Chamber what might be characterized as a positive, unqualified filibuster against a bill. That is the reason we have not made such progress upon this bill as we should have made.

I trust the Senator from Nevada will be ready to-morrow, and, if not to-morrow, by Monday next. I think he indicated that by Monday he would be ready to put his bill before the Senate and hold it before the Senate until there is action upon it. Whenever he indicates his purpose to do that I shall at once withdraw and desist from any effort to secure further consideration of the river and harbor bill until that matter is disposed of.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood the Senator from North Carolina to say that he was ready at any time to lay aside the river and harbor bill when the other bill was desired to be discussed?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; pursuant to the policy we have heretofore uniformly pursued in the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to say to the Senate that I am prepared to go on with a brief discussion of the trade commission bill, if the Senator will consent that that bill be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, before that unanimous consent is granted I desire to say a few words. The Senator from North Carolina has made a statement which I can not allow to go without answer and, I may say, without rebuke. I think the Senator assumes a great deal for himself when he says that one side of the Senate or half of one side of the Senate is engaged in a filibuster. I am perfectly aware that his statement reflects especially upon myself. I have not been filibustering.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I did not mean that remark to apply to the Senator, because I do not think he has done anything more than pursue what was a proper and legitimate course in discussing the bill. I have not heard him calling for a quorum, nor have I heard him raising captious objections. I did not apply that remark to the Senator from Ohio, because I do not think it would be just to do so.

Mr. BURTON. I accept most cordially the word of the Senator from North Carolina as regards myself, but as regards my associates I ought to say we believe this bill to be a very vicious bill, and it might as well be understood here and now that it will not pass the Senate without very thorough discussion. I think we may challenge those who favor this bill to defend it and to explain its provisions.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I note that this morning the Senator from North Carolina, when he was asked to name a single instance in which a project recommended by the Board of Engineers had not been included in the river and harbor bill, was unable to name even one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURTON. There has already been mention in the debate on this side of one section of improvement, that on the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri. I trust some one on the other side or on this side of the Chamber may rise here and justify that item. No degree of pressure, I may say, Mr. President, will abate one jot or one tittle from the disposition to give this bill thorough discussion.

I will leave off, as I commenced, by saying we think the bill vicious; we think its provisions should be exposed; we believe that there should be a campaign of education reaching to this Chamber and outside of this Chamber to the country; and I may assure Senators on the other side that this bill is not going to be disposed of just merely by taking it up in the morning hour or displacing another bill. I do not like the procedure. The trade commission bill we had supposed was an administration bill, one of urgent importance to the country, the main reason why Congress must be detained here indefinitely; but it seems to-day that it is displaced by the river and harbor bill, and that makes it necessary to discuss the river and harbor measure in a detached, fragmentary way.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that I propose to defend at some length the Texas items which he has attacked so vigorously, and I do not want my silence when he refers to those items to be interpreted as a concurrence in what he says. I am not going to answer now, in order to save as much time as possible, but I propose to discuss the Texas items and to defend them as best I can.

Mr. BURTON. I have not yet, in any remarks of mine, attacked the Texas items.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Oh, yes; the Senator has.

Mr. BURTON. Except in my minority report and in a general way. I assure the Senator from Texas that further time will be given to those items, and I am glad he is to defend them, and I may say that I have an added idea of his courage, of which I always had a very excellent opinion.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Well, Mr. President, the Senator has specifically referred to-day to the Trinity River and to the Sabine-Neches Canal, and both references——

Mr. BURTON. Those were but introductory, however.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Both references were glaringly inaccurate; and if his further discussion of Texas projects is equally inaccurate, they will not suffer at all from his attacks.

Mr. BURTON. I beg to assure the Senator from Texas that my remarks were only of a very general nature; they were but introductory to a probably much more elaborate treatment of those items, which they will receive before this discussion is finished.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from North Carolina what is going to be the course of business here in the future? If I may have the attention of the Senator from Nevada, I will say that I understand the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] would like to go on this afternoon, and I acquiesce with the utmost cordiality in the displacing of the river and harbor bill, so that the Senator from Michigan may proceed. I am ready to proceed with the discussion of the river and harbor bill, if it is so desired; but I should like to inquire what is to be the outcome of this? What is going to happen to-morrow or next day? Will the Senator from Michigan make a brief speech—and the Senator from Michigan always speaks briefly and very much to the point—and then will a motion be made to bring up the river and harbor bill again, and then will a motion be made to lay it aside; or what is coming?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] desires to make a speech this evening, as I understand, upon the trade commission bill. The river and harbor bill is before the Senate, and there is no reason in the world, if the Senator from Ohio will yield to him, why the Senator from Michigan can not make his speech in reference to the trade commission bill without displacing the river and harbor bill at all.

Mr. BURTON. But, Mr. President, I do not think we ought to pursue that course. I think the river and harbor bill should have no attacks made upon it because of the unusual length of the discussion devoted to it. If the Senator from Michigan is to speak on the trade commission bill, it should be while that bill is before the Senate; otherwise the claim may be made that we are unduly prolonging the debate on the river and harbor bill. The number of hours of discussion upon it may be magnified.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, he knows that it is a common thing, of everyday occurrence, that a Senator will speak on various and sundry subjects that have no relation to the bill that is actually before the Senate. That is not out of the ordinary at all; but if a Senator makes any objection to it, of course, nobody wants to take him off his feet. If the Senator wants to go on and speak, he has the floor; and nobody can take him off his feet, and nobody wants to take him off his feet.

Mr. BURTON. I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina to make a request that the trade commission bill be taken up.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Ohio yields for that purpose, I will make that motion, in pursuance of the arrangement which I have stated has been made. It is a common arrangement in this body when it is desired to facilitate a particular bill, and no Senator is ready to speak upon that bill, to lay it aside temporarily and place some other measure before the Senate for the purpose of enabling Senators to make speeches. I have stated very frankly that it is our desire on this side of the Chamber to facilitate the consideration of the trade commission bill, to the exclusion of other legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina move to take up the trade commission bill at this time?

Mr. SIMMONS. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of what is known as the trade commission bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	James	Norris	Sterling
Brandegee	Johnson	Overman	Sutherland
Bryan	Jones	Page	Swanson
Burton	Kenyon	Perkins	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kern	Ransdell	Thompson
Chilton	Lane	Saulsbury	Thornton
Clapp	Lewis	Sheppard	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Simmons	Vardaman
Colt	McCumber	Smith, Ga.	White
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.	Works
Hughes	Newlands	Smoot

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. ASHURST and Mr. CULBERSON responded to their names.

Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. BRADY, and Mr. STONE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I would not have put the Senate to the trouble of calling the roll if I could have had my way about it. I realize that Congress is tired under the strain and stress which has been put upon it during the last 18 months or 2 years, and its weariness, in my judgment, is shared by the country.

We have been laboring here, not for legislation which we as representatives of the people felt was demanded by them, or which was required to cure evils, great, growing, and evident, but we have been working under the unhealthful stimulus of political narcotics, and the result is bound to be, aye, it already is, a weak, unstable, and an anemic condition of the body politic.

Much of the legislation already written and now in process of enactment is an impeachment of the intelligence and the independence of the American Congress, for it never would have been enacted if the National Legislature had followed the dictates of its own judgment as to what was for the best interests of the people.

My observations to-day are based upon the legislative situation as it is, and I have in mind the fact that amendments are to be offered and new measures are to be brought forward, and the way in which they are brought forward may have some effect upon my vote.

The patriotic spirit of progress and reform is absolutely essential to the prosperity, the development, and the perpetuity of the Republic. Ultraconservatism, which denies that better and higher things in government are possible, will, if placed and continued in power, destroy the Government.

But reaction and fossilization are not the only enemies of our Republic. The legislative agitator or executive theorist who does something simply for the sake of doing it, who incites a false sentiment from which he hopes to get personal political credit, who thinks by reason of temporary power and influence to unsettle and change overnight the customs, character, and ideals which have been the growth of a people during the stress and storms of the centuries, is quite as great a menace to the march of progress as is his stand-pat contemporary. Both are inimical to moral and material progress.

I will not charge the President with being unpatriotic or insincere. I confess that I have but little reliable information on that subject. I do assert, however, that he is a theorist who, without constructive business experience of his own, nevertheless flies in the face of all experience and insists on driving his docile congressional adherents onto dangerous and untenable grounds.

The present legislative condition of the country is unreal, unstable, unsound, and unjustifiable.

The phenomenal growth and prosperity of our country has been brought to pass by the genius and efforts of man. This is a country of wonderful natural resources, and our national policy thus far has been to encourage inventive genius, masterful courage, and individual ambition to discover, reveal, and develop those resources. There is as surely a special genius for business as there is for painting, for music, for mathematics, or for oratory. I recognize my own limitations, and I thank God for having opened the eyes and unstopped the ears and touched the souls of some men and women, so that they could see and hear and reveal the wonderful possibilities which otherwise would have remained unknown to me. I never see a great painting which rivals nature but what I am impressed with the fact that the same divinity which produced the miracle of spring inspired the production on canvas. The thrilling notes of the singer are but the echoes of that harmony produced by the morning stars, and without the singer and the song the world would be destitute of much of its inspiration and delight. Before the honest man of business genius and superior courage I stand at attention, the same as I do before the creator of the Madonna or the producer of music sublime. He has seen and improved opportunities over which I have blindly stumbled. He has captured the lightning and harnessed it for the work of industry; he has tunneled rivers and lakes and mountains, so that commerce is sent under as well as over them; he has seen possibilities of usefulness floating in the blue sky and has brought them to earth for man's use and happiness; he has made Edens out of Saharas; he has covered the land with shops and factories which furnish the necessities of life for millions of people. His has been the initiative, the construction, and the maintenance of what we experience but do not appreciate as the material welfare of mankind. The mass of the people are without great native business initiative and genius. The policy of our Government has been, I repeat, to give the freest hand to individual enterprise and endeavor, and as a result the impossible of yesterday has become the reality of to-day; the rich man's house of our fathers is the laborer's cottage of the present; the one-time luxuries are now common necessities; the ox team which, as a boy, I drove to market is now supplanted by the automobile, and everybody rides; the homes of our boyhood, which were bare from necessity, are now decorated with the evidences of opulence; the stranger in town on a holiday would be unable to distinguish the son and daughter of wealth from the boys and girls who labor. All this and untold more has been the result of ambition's desire to have and to do and to be. In some countries industrial and commercial genius are recognized and rewarded by monuments and decorations of honor, but, unfortunately, as it seems to me, our Government has entered upon a time when business success is regarded and treated with suspicion and not infrequently as a thing of dishonor. The most of the people, like myself, have failed to amass a fortune. They have comforts and advantages undreamed of by the wealthy of the past, and yet there are those who have great fortunes, and the so-called less fortunate become the capital with which the political speculator deals in his operations against successful business. He is usually a business failure himself, due to the facts that he does not possess native business ability and that he does have at least a liking for politics and he finds it easier to criticize and destroy than it is to construct and create. I have known men who never gave a day's work to labor, who never added a thing of material value to the world's goods, to speak contemptuously of success and to find sweet satisfaction in throwing wrenches into the wheels of industry. With that class of people I have no sympathy, and their domination of government will spell want and suffering, ruin and disaster.

I realize, of course, that no national legislator will admit that he is actuated by a desire to throttle or impede legitimate industry; and I do not believe that anyone is primarily so actuated; but I do believe that in their desire to curry what they believe to be popular favor some are willing to say and do things which appeal to passion and prejudice rather than to reason. Gentlemen sometimes act as though they thought that all the possibilities of human endeavor and development had been achieved. Why, there are still more things in our world than have been dreamed of in our philosophy. The borderland of accomplishment has scarcely been reached. With human genius and enterprise unfettered by unwisdom the future will unfold blessings for humanity far greater than those now known, and the policy of our Government should be one full of hope and encouragement, rather than of obstruction and discouragement. There was a time when machinery was regarded as the enemy of labor, and yet it is now known that mechanical devices have not only increased and improved the world's necessities, but they have multiplied the demand for labor, enlarged its wages, and made its condition better. Let not this Government brand honest effort with dishonor or encloud it with unjust suspicion.

There may be, and I think there is, a legitimate element of speculation in business, but there ought not to be speculation in legislation. It should be a science exact and certain. Let it not be understood from what I have said that all business should go unbridled and uncontrolled. It should not be hobbled or hamstrung; but inasmuch as it can exist only under government, it should be subject to government; and inasmuch, also, as a republic is one for the just and absolutely equal benefit of all, no business man and no other man should be permitted to employ his money, his labor, or his genius to the detriment of any other man. Caruso must not be permitted to deny ambition to the novitiate; Sargent must not destroy the tyro's brush; Carnegie must not prevent promotion for the molder. It is the business of government to keep forever open and unobstructed the way of opportunity. It should not be closed either to the man of great genius and honest purpose or to the weakest, humblest novice who seeks to travel it.

I shall not review the pitiful surrender of individual opinion and intellectual freedom on the part of this Congress as recorded in its rubber-stamp legislation up to date. Much of it will constitute a page to which the future student of history will not turn with pride. I will at this time confine myself in a general way to the administration program now under so-called consideration. It attempts to deal with the business of the United States, complicated as it is by the dual laws of our two forms of government; developed and established under customs and statutes of more than a century, ramifying every section of the country, and affecting every citizen of the Republic.

This program was conceived by the President. It is a hydra-headed creature, and I am convinced that a Hercules at this time would be a benefactor to the country. The thing apparently has its lair in two committees of the Senate, and for a time it looked as though it might be torn to pieces in the struggle for jurisdiction, but now that its true nature is discovered there seems to be some willingness to let the other fellow have it. The senior Senator from Nevada appears to have some pride of authorship in the so-called trade commission bill, but I think I have seen a most commendable self-denial on his part in his disposition not to correlate or coordinate or consolidate his measure with the Clayton bill, or with any of the other numerous measures pending before the Senate committees.

The bill now under consideration transforms the Bureau of Corporations into a commission of five members, increases the salary of $5,000 for the Commissioner of Corporations to $50,000 for the board of commissioners, and increases the other existing expenses by possibly several hundredfold. The present duties of investigation by the bureau into the affairs of individuals and corporate business are emphasized and made more imperative. Like the rain and the dew, it falls impartially upon the just and the unjust, although the commission which is responsible to no power outside of its own will can determine which corporations shall be investigated and which shall not. It can require annual and special reports costing millions of dollars from all corporations in the United States or from any class of them, and I suppose it also will have the authority to rent such buildings or blocks as may be necessary in which to store these reports when they are received.

It has another rather striking authority, viz, the right to employ and fix the salaries of such attorneys, accountants, experts, examiners, and special agents and other employees as may be appropriated for by Congress, but with the exception—please note the exception—with the exception of "such attorneys, accountants, experts, examiners, and special agents," all employees shall be a part of the classified service. You will observe with what high regard the civil service is held. The janitors and messengers will be under the merit system. The rest may be political spoils, rich, attractive, and potential.

If only the offenders against business ethics were to be investigated, one active, capable man and a few experts could make the investigation and report, but I must admit that with the presumption that all business must be watched and its methods supervised a large army of attorneys, experts, and special political agents will be required, and, besides, the commission must justify its existence. It must, and probably will, be doing something, and the speculation as to just what that will be is a menace to enterprise and will continue to be such.

To the original bill, or rather to the last of its many expurgated editions presented to the committee on this subject by the distinguished Senator from Nevada, has been added two provisions. One authorizes the commission to make an expedition into foreign countries to discover the discriminations and other embarrassments which surround American products in foreign countries. This, of course, will provide a most enjoyable trip for the commissioners, even though it may not be highly profitable to the Government. If our exports continue to decrease as they are decreasing now, and as unwise congressional interference will hasten the decrease, our sales abroad will become a negligible quantity and there will be nothing to conserve, and, besides, it seems to be forgotten that our Government has consular agents in all countries now, and that their duty is to look after our trade and trade conditions.

The other provision is to permit this new commission to define, prohibit, and punish unfair competition, and all this for the purpose of encouraging business by quieting its fears and reviving its confidence.

The theory which through legislative enactment would destroy the unfair competition which leads to monopoly is a good one, and if this commission was needed to discover and punish business offenders who are admittedly less than 5 per cent of the business men of the country, it might possibly have some excuse for its existence. But is it necessary for Congress, even if it could do so, to delegate legislative power to a commission for this purpose? I have felt that the Sherman law is a most perfect and complete remedy for monopoly and improper restraint of trade. I had felt, and I still feel, that no new monopolies have had recent birth. I know of none. I have heard of none. Until and unless our Government abates its zeal in prosecuting offenders against the antitrust laws no new monopoly will be attempted. The Sherman law has been interpreted and established. Every offender knows what it means and will hesitate to incur its penalties. It is possible that such a commission might be useful, and I believe it would be, to assist the courts in carrying out their decrees of dissolution in cases of existing monopolistic combinations. It might be constituted of men with business experience, and their fitness for reorganization would be of value. But is not this a very complicated machine for so simple a purpose? Why, I know of several Senators who insist that they could have provided a better method for dissolving and reorganizing the Standard Oil and Tobacco companies than was employed by the court and attorneys in the suits against those companies. Perhaps a commission composed of men already on the Government pay roll might be created to advise the courts in cases of dissolution and reorganization. It seems to me that the gun provided in the bill is out of all proportion to the real game sought. We would not think of hunting chipmunks with a cannon. The proposed effort to destroy illegal business is like firing grape and canister into a flock of sheep in order to kill a diseased one in their midst. Better get a good marksman with a rifle, and he will hit the sheep marked for slaughter and leave the rest harmless. A fearless, honest, and capable Department of Justice is already sufficiently armed to destroy monopoly and monopolistic practices.

I know that business men, like farmers and laborers, are, in the great majority, honest. I believe that a few of all classes are dishonest and dishonorable. If the laws for controlling the latter are not sufficient, let us direct our attention to the business of reforming these laws, but let us not indict all men as rogues and then allow a commission to investigate them and give clean bills of business health to those who, according to its arbitrary standard, are found honest and law-abiding. One of the fundamental principles of our jurisprudence is the presumption that all men are honest and innocent until proven guilty. Business men as a class are as honest, as much interested in the general good, and as patriotic as Congressmen. They are quite as essential to the welfare of the country. If this Congress were to adjourn and its Members could not assemble for a year, the country would not materially suffer. Millions of our citizens believe it would benefit by the prohibition; but if business were suspended for 12 months our Treasury would be bankrupt and our credit destroyed. Want, misery, and famine would abide in every laborer's home. The products of agriculture would rot in the fields or accumulate in granaries until forcibly seized by hands made desperate by starvation.

Mr. President, the temper of the people is not right for more radical speculative legislation at this time. The Congress is not now in mental or physical condition to frame and enact laws with such possibly disastrous consequences as these now proposed. If the trades commission bill was the only experiment to be tried, industry might survive under the paternal control of a commission endowed with discretion to withhold the rod from at least its favored children, but it is proposed not alone to enter the precincts of private business and to impose millions of expense upon it, but the already too-strained relations between employer and employee are to be intensified. With one hand the Sherman antitrust law is sought to be strengthened, while with the other it is to be weakened.

Able, conscientious Senators have argued long and eloquently upon the pending bill, but they have spoken to empty seats. At no time within the last two months has there been for one continuous hour a quorum of the Senate present in this Chamber. During most of the time fewer than a dozen Senators have been in their seats. Members of this body are to-day in Europe and in other foreign countries seeking rest and pleasure; a number are at their homes trying to induce their constituents to return them to the Sixty-fourth Congress; a number are in hospitals; some have died during the year; Senators are not here. They have little interest in this legislation. Very few know anything about it. A majority, however, will vote for the administration program, even though they may have doubts as to its necessity or wisdom.

Nearly every Senator will admit that he is mentally and physically fagged. For 18 months we have been in continuous session. During the last four years Congress has spent the dog days in this Capital. It would be better for the country if the pending matters were postponed until December. In the meanwhile all Senators could go home and talk with their constituents. The change would be restful, and the information received would result in saner, safer, more truly progressive legislation hereafter.

Business is sick and all the psychological mental healers can not cure it, and especially will it not recover so long as it is made the shuttlecock of political weavers.

The people want Congress to adjourn and go home. Inasmuch as my high prerogative seems to be to assist the majority in maintaining a quorum—a record quorum, but not an actual one—and for the purpose of enacting legislation proposed by the President and with which I have little sympathy, but which I am powerless to prevent, I think I, too, shall take a rest and allow responsibility to rest with power.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have sat here this afternoon and listened with a great deal of interest, first to the discussion between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] as to what ought to be the legislative "program" of the Senate and, lastly, to the very interesting, thorough, and philosophical address of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

The trouble is, however, that none of these Senators have dropped the plummet into the current and struck bottom. There is a reason, Mr. President, why it is impossible to maintain a constant quorum here. There is a reason why the Senate is practically paralyzed. That reason is not found in the work that the Senate has done; it is not found in the fact that for 18 long months we have been here in continuous session; but it is found, sir, in a system that can have no other outcome than the paralysis of the Senate, the deadening of the initiative, and the loss of interest by the Members of the Senate.

The vice is a fundamental one. We are not to-day dealing with the defects that experience has developed in the legislation of this country, but we are called here to carry out a vague something called by the administration a "program," and everything is raked with a fine-toothed comb, not to find defects that need repairing, but to find something that can be strung together in the form of legislation, in order that it may be paraded as answering the promise of a "program."

Mr. President, that system is absolutely, radically, and fundamentally wrong. It leads to illogical, ill-considered legislation, much of it undesirable, and at the same time permits defects that should be remedied to go unnoticed and to be passed by, because under this system of a "program" to which everything else must be subordinated the thoughtful, studious man reflects that there is little encouragement for his bringing to the attention of the Senate those defects here and there which should be remedied by legislation.

We witnessed this afternoon the spectacle of two Senators—the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], a man who has spent the better part of a long and laborious lifetime in the study of this subject of the regulation of trusts and transportation, a man whose experience and trained mind should be a valuable contribution to any legislative body, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] one of the ablest lawyers in this country, high and conscientious in his ideals—discussing with one another the question of the legislative "program" of this body. The Senator from Iowa very properly suggested to the Senator from Utah that the inquiry of the Senator from Utah as to what the Senate should do should have been directed to the other side of this body. The Senator from Iowa, I feel, fell short in that suggestion. It should be directed to a power outside of this body.

I know, Mr. President, it is very easy for one's critics to say of him that he stands here and attacks an administration. I know that one meets with no responsive echo in the public mind when he criticizes an administration, because I realize that humanity, in crossing that gulf which rolls between the monarchy and the republic, seems to have brought something along—something of the old-time tradition of the divine right of the king to rule—that results in our seeking to place somewhere, even in free government, a function above question. Hence I appreciate the prestige of the Executive, which, among us, seems, in a measure, to take the place of the old idea of the divine right of the king.

But, Mr. President, notwithstanding that, I, for one, shall not remain silent under these circumstances. I undertake to say that the system is unsafe by which one man assumes to dictate the policy of a nation, and he a man with no experience at all; a man whose public declarations show that in the integrity of his purpose he stands confronted to-day by the declarations which he made two and four and six years ago. While it is a splendid tribute to his integrity that he can thus confront his own declarations, it is a touching commentary upon his capacity to deal with public questions in their relation to business matters and business activities.

Yet under this system which has thus been developed Congress is told not to go forth in that broad equation of wisdom and justice which should be reflected in an open and free discussion upon this floor, but to take, cut and dried, a "program" in the framing of which a great portion of this body has little or nothing whatever to do.

I know that last year men grown grey in the service of the public, men intensely loyal and devoted to the spirit of duty, spent the entire summer here upon a great bill affecting legislation, and in the end they had about as much to do with framing that bill as the boys who attend the elevators and wait upon our wants about this Chamber.

At this very time we are going through the same ceremony in these committees. Men of experience, men of integrity, men who would like to see legislation for the best interests of this country, are absolutely powerless to shape or mold that legislation.

Is it any wonder then, Mr. President, that a paralysis has seized this body? Is it any wonder then that it is impossible to keep a quorum to sit here and listen to the discussion of this great question?

Mr. President, we are confronted to-day by a proposition that five years ago would have startled every thoughtful citizen of this Republic, and that is to place in the hands of five men, not the power to interpret law, not the power to make law, perhaps, through the processes of interpretation which our courts have taken to themselves, but with power to make law of their own motion, and without any guide from the constituted legislative authority of the Government.

We may be obliged to do that. I may yet myself vote for this measure. One sometimes stands here like a man with his back to the wall. He has to decide one way or the other. Now we have a proposition before us to clothe five men with authority to say what is the law, what is an offense, or what is not an offense; and yet, far-reaching as is this proposed change, fundamental as it is, related to our form of government, if we debate it at all it is practically under a system where—so far as the debate affects the pending legislation itself—it is reduced to a negligible quantity.

So absolute has become this system, so powerful its prestige, that it is proposed to put such a law through this body without any prospect of debate seriously affecting the result. So self-evident is that that in the discussion of the proposition by men like the eminent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] upon the one hand and the eminent Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] upon the other, a proposition so radical that five years ago it would have shocked every thoughtful citizens of this Republic, those men have to stand here and discuss that great radical change to Senators whose interest in the matter is more of an interest in the intellectuality of the debate than in its possible effect upon the legislation itself.

Mr. President, I do not know whether a change will ever come. Sometimes I feel that this prestige of the Executive, this shadow that came across when we transferred government from monarchy to republic, is so strong that it may even yet in this land of ours amount rather to an increase than to a diminution of the power of the Executive. But it is absolutely foreign to our spirit of government.

Free government, in relation to a self-constituted trustee, strangely enough was never enunciated more clearly nor more strongly than by the President himself in one of his speeches in 1912 when he said, "I do not believe in trusteeship nor in guardianship." Free government is based upon the theory that no purely human being is good enough to be the self-constituted guardian or trustee of another being. This Government is based upon the theory that in the vast diversity of interests from one ocean to the other, from the northern border to the southern border, there shall come from every State a representation, and in that representation there shall be developed an equation of interest, an equation of intelligence, and an equation of purpose.

But the theory that one man, with perhaps two or three at his elbow, can cut out, carve, and give to Congress, cut and dried, a great legislative program is absolutely foreign and hostile to the spirit of free government.

Mr. President, I am not at this time going to discuss the provisions of these measures. I believe, with the Senator from Iowa, that if we could discuss them to an open and impartial tribunal, they ought to be discussed together.

As an example of that, to-day there is pending at the hands of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] an amendment to the trade commission bill, which is also a part of the Clayton bill now before the Committee on the Judiciary. As a further illustration of this truth there are now pending before the Judiciary Committee several amendments of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] which, if passed, would render this provision in the trade commission bill absolutely of little use or force.

I believe that if we could once throw off this thralldom, if we could once stand here as an independent, free Senate, the Representatives of sovereign States, and work out on this floor an equation of interest, an equation of intelligence, and an equation of purpose, it would be well, indeed, to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa and have all these bills before us at the same time.

More than that, Mr. President, I believe that if it were possible to throw off this thralldom and the Senate stand here as the independent representatives of sovereign States and deal with this great problem, it would be the part of wisdom to postpone the deliberation until next fall. But of what use is it that we consider these bills? The people have no means of knowing all their details.

The Senator from Nevada has said once or twice there has been a referendum on the trade commission bill. I undertake to say that there are not a thousand men in this country to-day who realize that it is proposed to put into this trade commission bill a power conferred upon five men that we never conferred even upon the courts of this country. If we could take these bills and place them before the public, go back to the public during this summer, and come back here next fall free and independent, representing the respective States, I would be in favor of postponing action. But we can not do that.

The mischief, the vice, the evil is deeper and more fundamental than that. Without any reflection upon those who have yielded and will yield to this policy of dictation and one-man power, so long as that stands and so long as the American people stand for it, then, in my humble judgment, the sooner we can take these measures, make our earnest and honest protest and, if possible, here and there secure some modification of them, and relieve the country of the hysteria depending upon the pendency of this legislation in Congress, I believe it is the better for the country that we do it.

But once again I want to say that the vice and the evil is deeper and more fundamental than the terms of these bills, and until the American people wake up and realize that there must be somewhere in this Government an equation worked out, so long as the American people stand for the putting through of legislation in this form and in this manner, we will have haphazard legislation dealing with great and fundamental changes without consideration.

Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. The evil of this system is that instead of going forth, as each separate Representative and Senator should go forth, and, as he finds here and there some defect that needs a remedy, submit it for consideration, the wide field, I say again, is ransacked as with a fine-toothed comb, not to find those things which should be remedied but to find a lot of stuff that can be heaped together in this sort of a manner and answer the purpose of a preannounced legislative program.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a little out of order of discussion, I want to ask the attention of the Senate to one phase of the trade commission bill. I especially desire to challenge the attention of the friends of that bill, if I may be able so to do. I am going to try to make this as brief as possible. I simply intend to discuss a legal question, and not to discuss the general merits of the bill.

If I am right in my conclusion as to the law, then section 5 of the trade commission bill will have to be rewritten by its friends, because it will not accomplish the things which they hope to accomplish.

Section 5 provides as follows:

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.

Aside from those lines which I have just read, there is no definition of "unfair competition in commerce."

In addressing myself to this subject a few days ago I asserted rather broadly that the term "unfair competition in commerce" had no definite or fixed meaning in law. I find that the statement which I made is broader than I intended to make it. I meant to say, and I now say, that "unfair competition" has no such meaning in the law as will embrace the objects and purposes of the author of this bill. If the term has no definite and fixed meaning, and if no definition is given, then it is void for uncertainty; but that is a phase of the question which I need not now argue. If, on the other hand, the term has a definite, fixed meaning in the law at the present time, that meaning will be incorporated into the statute, as all lawyers know, and if the meaning as it is now determined by the courts is different from the meaning which the author of the bill intended to give the phrase, then, instead of securing the legislation he desires, he would get something entirely different.

I assert now, first, that where a term has a common-law meaning, where it has been frequently construed by the courts, a statute thereafter passed and employing that term is held to employ it in the sense and with the meaning that it has previously been given by the decisions of the courts. I have numerous authorities to that effect. I will cite them by title, and only call attention to the language of one. I read from Lewis's Sutherland Statutory Construction, second edition, volume 2, paragraph 398:

Words having a special sense in the common law: Where a statute uses a word which is well known and has a definite sense at common law or in the written law without defining it, it will be presumed to be used in that sense and will be so construed, unless it clearly appears that it was not so intended.

Under that there are cited something like 100 decisions of all the courts of the land.

Words having a precise and well-settled meaning in the jurisprudence of a country are to be understood in the same sense when used in statutes, unless a different meaning is unmistakably intended.

And under that there are a number of cases cited.

The courts go even further than that, as witness:

Where words have been long used in a technical sense and have been judicially construed to have a certain meaning, and have been adopted by the legislature as having a certain meaning prior to a particular statute in which they are used, the rule of construction requires that the words used in such statutes should be construed according to the sense in which they have been so previously used, although that sense may vary from the strict literal meaning of the words. And if the legislature use words which have received judicial interpretation, they are presumed to be used in that sense, unless the contrary intent can be gathered from the statute.

I will not proceed further in the reading of any authority upon this point. I content myself with calling attention to this standard work, to the large number of cases which it cites, and directing the attention of the Senate, very respectfully, to two cases, namely, what is known as the Abbottsford case, reported in Ninety-eighth United States, at 440, where the language employed is:

A statute adopting a phrase carries with it the previous judicial construction of the phrase, unless the contrary plainly appears.

I also call attention to United States against Trans-Missouri Freight Association, in One hundred and sixty-sixth United States, page 290, and expressly to page 328; also to United States v. Coppersmith (4 Fed. Rep., 200); McCool v. Smith (1 Black), a very early decision in the Supreme Court of the United States, page 459; and to McDonald v. Hovey (110 U. S.), the local citation being page 628, where this language appears:

It is a received canon of construction, acquiesced in by this court—

"That where English statutes, such, for instances, as the statute of frauds and the statute of limitations, have been adopted into our own legislation, the known and settled construction of those statutes by courts of law has been considered as silently incorporated into the acts or has been received with all the weight of authority." (Pennock v.

Dialogue, 2 Pet., 1, 18; Smith's Commentaries on Stat. and Const. Law, sec. 634; Sedgwick on Construction of Stat. and Const. Law, 363.)

Numerous cases are cited from State courts to the same tenor and effect.

I also call attention to the case In re Green (52 Fed. Rep., p. 111), where Judge Jackson used this language:

When Congress, under and in the exercise of powers conferred by the Constitution, adopts or creates common-law offenses, the courts may properly look to that body of jurisprudence for the true meaning and definition of such crimes if they are not clearly defined in the act creating them. (U. S. v. Armstrong, 2 Curt., 446; U. S. v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed., 198.)

Those authorities, together with a multitude of other cases all of like import, to which I find no exception in any well-considered cases, make it perfectly plain that when we enact this bill and use the phrase "unfair competition," if that phrase has a definite and settled meaning in the law, we will adopt the phrase with that meaning, unless by a clear and explicit statement we give to the phrase another and a different meaning.

I challenge your attention now to the fact that in this entire bill there is not a word undertaking to define "unfair competition." Therefore, if the phrase is brought into the statute, it will necessarily come with the fixed meaning it already has, assuming for the moment that it has such a fixed and definite meaning.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The same rule of construction for which the Senator contends was also recognized by the United States Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; I think there is no exception to it.

That brings us squarely to the question whether the phrase "unfair competition" has a fixed meaning in the law. I read from Black's Law Dictionary:

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

A term which may be applied generally to all dishonest or fraudulent rivalry in trade and commerce, but is particularly applied in the courts of equity (where it may be restrained by injunction) to the practice of endeavoring to substitute one's own goods or products in the markets for those of another, having an established reputation and extensive sale, by means of imitating or counterfeiting the name, title, size, shape, or distinctive peculiarities of the article, or the shape, color, label, wrapper, or general appearance of the package, or other such simulations, the imitation being carried far enough to mislead the general public or deceive an unwary purchaser, and yet not amounting to an absolute counterfeit or to the infringement of a trade-mark or trade name. Called in France and Germany "concurrence delovale." (See Reddaway v. Banham (1896), App. Cas., 199; Singer Mfg. Co. v. June Mfg. Co., 163 U. S., 169, 16 Sup. Ct., 1002, 41 L. Ed., 118; Dennison Mfg. Co. v. Thomas Mfg. Co (C. C.), 94 Fed., 651; Simmons Medicine Co. v. Mansfield Drug Co., 93 Tenn., 84, 23 S. W., 165; Cornelius v. Ferguson, 17 S. D., 481, 97 N. W., 390; Sterling Remedy Co. v. Eureka Chemical Co., 80 Fed., 108, 25 C. C. A., 314; T. B. Dunn Co. v. Trix Mfg. Co., 50 App. Div., 75, 63 N. Y. Supp., 333.)

In Words and Phrases, I find this definition of "unfair competition":

With respect to articles placed upon the market for sale, it is only when the one article is dressed so as to represent the other and to deceive a proposing purchaser as being that other, that there can be said to be a case of "unfair trade." (Sterling Remedy Co. v. Eureka Chemical & Mfg. Co. (U. S.), 80 Fed., 105, 108; 25 C. C. A., 314.)

The doctrine of unfair competition in trade rests on the proposition that equity will not permit anyone to palm off his goods on the public as those of another. Unfair competition in trade, as distinguished from infringement of trade-marks, does not involve the violation of any exclusive right to the use of trade-marks or symbols. The word may be purely descriptive, and the mark or symbol indicative only of style, size, shape, or quality, and as such open to the public. Yet there may be unfair competition in trade by an improper use of such mark or symbol. (Dennison Mfg. Co. (U. S.), 94 Fed., 651, 656.)

The term "unfair competition in trade" includes the simulation by defendant of the packages of plaintiff, putting up and selling packages of the same general appearance as those of the plaintiff. The court will only interfere to protect the plaintiff and the public and for the suppression of unfair and dishonest competition when "the resemblance is such that it is calculated to deceive, and does in fact deceive, the ordinary buyer, making his purchases under the ordinary conditions which prevail in the conduct of the particular traffic to which the controversy relates" (T. B. Dunn Co. v. Trix Mfg. Co., 63 N. Y. Supp., 333, 335, 50 App. Div., 75.)

I call attention to the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, commonly called "Cyc." If lawyers will examine the text, they will find it is more forceful because of the position in which it is placed than it otherwise would be. To illustrate, the topic "unfair competition" is a separate topic, but it is discussed in connection with trade-marks; and in a wonderfully exhaustive article the hair-fine distinction between infringement of trade-marks and unfair competition is drawn. I content myself for the present, however, with reading very briefly from this work.

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

Unfair competition consists in passing off or attempting to pass off, upon the public, the goods or business of one person as and for the goods or business of another. It consists essentially in the conduct of a trade or business in such a manner that there is either an express or implied representation to that effect. And it may be stated broadly that any conduct, the natural and probable tendency and effect of which is to deceive the public so as to pass off the goods or business of one person as and for that of another constitutes actionable unfair competition. The definition is comprehensive enough to reach every possible means of effecting the result. Unfair competition as thus defined is a legal wrong for which the courts afford a remedy. It is a tort and a fraud.

Now, listen to this language, because it is the key to the entire doctrine:

The basic principle is that no one has a right to dress up his goods or otherwise represent them in such a manner as to deceive an intending purchaser and induce him to believe he is buying the goods of another. No monopoly is created or fostered by protection against unfair competition, but the court should be careful not to interfere with free and fair competition, and should confine itself to preventing fraud and imposition from some real resemblance in name or dress of goods.

This phrase has a common-law meaning. Its meaning is clearly set forth in the English decisions. The courts of this country have for years been in accord with the courts of England. In both countries the meaning of the term is held to only cover the practice of imitating the goods of another. That is, therefore, the meaning which would be carried into this statute. I call attention to some English cases cited in the note:

Care must be taken in these cases not to extend the meaning of the word "unfair" to cover that which may be unethical but is not illegal. It may be unethical for one trader to take advantage of the advertising of his neighbor, but his so doing would in many instances be entirely legal. * * * What conduct on the part of a defendant will be held to constitute unfair competition is the subject matter of discussion in cases too numerous for useful citation, but the principle applied in each case is extremely simple. As Lord Chancellor Halsbury said in the House of Lords, in the case of Reddaway v. Banham (1896) (A. C., 199, 204; 65 L. J. Q. B., 381; 74 L. T. Rep. N. S., 289; 44 Wkly. Rep., 638; 25 Eng. Rul. Cas., 197): "For myself, I believe the principle of law may be very plainly stated, and that is that nobody has any right to represent his goods as the goods of somebody else." (Periberg v. Smith, 70 N. J. Eq., 638, 642; 62 Atl., 442.)

That is the English construction, and it has for many years been the common-law construction. It is at the same time the construction in this country of the term "unfair competition."

A word or two more. I read from the note in "Cyc.," at page 5596, an excerpt from a case in One hundred and thirtieth Federal Reporter:

The law of unfair competition seeks only to restrain fraudulent practices inducing confusion of goods and deception of the public, and it can not be used to prevent a defendant from adopting a trade-mark or label intended to attract attention and popularize its product, although it results, and is intended to result, in better enabling it to compete with complainant, where no deception or confusion of goods is caused or intended thereby. (G. W. Cole Co. v. American Cement, etc., Co., 130 Fed., 703; 65 C. C. A., 105.) The doctrine of unfair competition is based on the principle of common business integrity, and equity only affords relief when this principle has been violated, and the mischief which equity will guard against is a confusion in trade names or in the identity of parties or in the goods sold, so as to deceive the public and work a fraud on the party having a right to a trade name. (Eastern Outfitting Co. v. Manheim, 59 Wash., 428; 110 Pac., 23.)

Referring to the text (38 Cyc., p. 760):

Relief against unfair competition is properly afforded upon the ground that one who has built up a good will and reputation for his goods or business is entitled to all the benefits therefrom. Such good will is property, and like other property is protected against invasion. The deception of the public injures the proprietor of the business by diverting his customers and depriving him of sales which he otherwise would have made. This, rather than protection of the public against imposition, is the true and sound basis for the private remedy, although it is often said that the remedy proceeds in part upon the theory of protection to the public against fraud.

Mr. President, I could read at great length from this author and from the cases cited. I call attention, in the moment that is left before recess, to this (38 Cyc., p. 763):

The present tendency is to decide every case upon the ground of unfair competition, by making the decision turn upon whether or not the effect of what was done is to pass off the goods or business of one man as those of another regardless of the existence of any technical trade-mark.

And so the author goes on and distinguishes the trade-mark question.

All through these books you will find that "unfair competition" is used as a descriptive term to cover the substitution by A of his goods for the goods of B, selling his goods to the public or imposing his goods upon the public as and for the goods of another, thus defrauding the public and defrauding the producer of the particular line of goods that has an established reputation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator to yield for just a moment. Assuming that the law was as the Senator has stated from the books from which he has read at the time the decisions were rendered, let me suggest to the Senator that since those decisions there has been a very large discussion in all these antitrust cases of the terms "fair competition" and "unfair competition." So far as the economists are concerned, the term "unfair competition" has a very wide significance. Now, the question is whether that wider significance has not been recognized by the more recent decisions of the courts.

I wish to call attention, briefly, so that the Senator can consider it, to the Standard Oil case and a few other cases where this term "unfair competition" has been used as having a wider significance than that to which the Senator alludes.

In the Standard Oil case, for instance, the court, speaking by Mr. Chief Justice White, says:

Without attempting to follow the elaborate averments on these subjects spread over 57 pages of the printed record, it suffices to say that such averments may properly be grouped under the following heads: Rebates, preferences, and other discriminatory practices in favor of the combination by railroad companies; restraint and monopolization by control of pipe lines and unfair practices against competing pipe lines; contracts with competitors in restraint of trade; unfair methods of competition, such as local price cutting at the points where necessary to suppress competition; espionage of the business of competitors; the operation of bogus independent companies; and payments of rebates on oil, with the like intent.

In State v. Fairmont Creamery Co. (153 Iowa, 702, 709, 710) the court, by Evans, judge, said:

One of the great legislative problems of the day is to protect fair competition in the business world without unduly interfering with the freedom of contract.

The Senator will thus perceive that the United States Supreme Court regards the words "unfair competition" as having a much wider significance than that alluded to in the decisions to which the Senator has referred.

Now, let me call the attention of the Senator to another case where the Nebraska statute prohibits unfair competition.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, I do not think we will gain any light on this question by reading the statute of a State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I will not refer to that, as the time is brief.

In order to get very complete and specific information about unfair competition one has only to turn to the decrees in cases under the Sherman Act. There will be found, precisely defined, numerous examples of unfair competition. Nowhere is it more indispensable to use language having precise meaning than in a decree. Yet in the case of United States against General Electric Co., in the decree entered by the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Ohio, eastern division, at the end of the eighth clause, enjoining the use of a specific unfair method of competition, the following language is found:

Provided further, That nothing in this decree shall be taken in any respect to enjoin or restrain fair, free, and open competition.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we would get nearer a conclusion if the Senator would produce these authorities at the close of what I have to say and let us debate them. I am in the middle of a sentence when I am interrupted, to have my attention diverted to some expression loosely used in an opinion. No one can with certainty tell the import of the language until he has the books before him; but, judging from the quotation read, it amounts to nothing more than that a court used the expression "unfair" in the colloquial and ordinary sense; whereas, with all the respect in the world for the Senator, I tell him that if he writes this statute as it is now written, it is as certain as anything laying in the future can be that when the courts come to construe it they will take the meaning that has been attached to "unfair competition" by all of the courts of England and of this country, that has been written into the digests, text-books, and dictionaries of the law, and he will find that he has accomplished nothing by his bill except to prohibit the imitation by one dealer of the goods of another. Now, the Senator ought not to want a law to be passed with that certainty staring him in the face. If you desire to reach the varieties of competition that are dishonest and rascally and oppressive, you must find some phrase to describe those practices aside from a phrase that has a crystallized and definite meaning in the law, and that means something entirely different from that which you desire to accomplish.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to know why we did not commence at the beginning of the calendar?

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the Senate began the consideration of the calendar at the point where it was left off.

Mr. SWANSON. When was unanimous consent given?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

Mr. SWANSON. This is the regular order, because before unanimous consent can be given the roll must be called and a quorum must be present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no rule of that kind.

Mr. SWANSON. Before unanimous consent is given?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say that when the motion was made this afternoon it was to take up the calendar.

Mr. BRYAN. And to consider bills unobjected to.

Mr. SWANSON. Not where it was left off.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that unanimous consent was asked of the Senate to begin the calendar at Order of Business 327, and there was no objection.

Mr. SWANSON. I was present then, and I do not know whether I shall consent to that. The Senator from Utah has objected to several bills that I have reported before that point, and I think the right way is to commence at the beginning of the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Utah did not make the request. I made the request, and if there is any objection to it I have no objection to going back and commencing at the beginning of the calendar.

Mr. THOMAS. It seems to me that the course we are pursuing is the more equitable one, because otherwise we will never get to the end of the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. We never will.

Mr. THOMAS. There is as important business near the end of the calendar as there is in the first part of the calendar. We have taken up the calendar a number of times but have never been able to get entirely through with it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to suggest that after we proceed with the calendar for a little while, if any Senator wishes to call up a bill preceding those to be reached to-night, unanimous consent can be asked for that purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. We will content ourselves with proceeding with the calendar as we are now doing.

Mr. BRYAN. As I understood the motion this afternoon it was that the Senate should take a recess to meet to-night to consider unobjected bills on the calendar. I entered the Chamber just as the call of the calendar began, and I heard Order of Business 327 called. I think with the Senator from Colorado that we will never get to the bills toward the end of the calendar unless we begin at the point where we left off. The truth is that for the last three or four times we have not started at the beginning of the calendar, but we have started somewhere about the middle of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that happened only once.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business on the calendar will be stated.

SOUTHERN COMMERCIAL CONGRESS.

Senate resolution 321, to print as a document proceedings of the Fourth Annual Convention of the Southern Commercial Congress, arranged as a memorial to the late Dr. Seaman A. Knapp, was announced as next in order, and there being no objection the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the papers presented in the Senate by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] March 12, 1914, "Proceedings of the Fourth Annual Convention of the Southern Commercial Congress, arranged as a memorial to the late Dr. Seaman A. Knapp," be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PREFERENTIAL BALLOT.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 320, to print as a Senate document the address by Lewis Jerome Johnson before the First National Conference on Popular Government upon "The preferential ballot as a possible substitute for the direct primary."

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to ask the Senator who objected to withdraw the objection to the resolution. It is an address by Prof. Lewis Jerome Johnson, of Harvard University, on "The preferential ballot as a possible substitute for the direct primary." We have had a chance to see how it would work in the Federal reserve act. I went to the Treasury Department to find how it has worked, and they are very much pleased with it. This is a matter for which there are constant calls. I do not know what Senator objected, but I hope he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I asked that the resolution might go over. I wish it to go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection the resolution goes over.

EDWARD L. KEYES.

The bill (S. 5087) for the relief of Edward L. Keyes was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has an amendment pending to the bill which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, in his discretion, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Edward L. Keyes, late second lieutenant, Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry, to be a captain of Cavalry in the United States Army and to place him on the retired list of the Army with the rank of captain as of date of the approval of this act: Provided, That no pay, compensation, or allowance of any kind for any cause prior to the passage of this act shall accrue or be paid to said Edward L. Keyes by reason of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

MINE RESCUE CAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

ESTATE OF T. J. SEMMES.

The bill (S. 1089) for the relief of the estate of T. J. Semmes, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Myra E. Semmes, executrix and sole legatee of T. J. Semmes, deceased, late of New Orleans, $395.55, in full payment for rents collected by the United States during the Civil War from property owned by T. J. Semmes and situate at New Orleans, La.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in merely glancing at the report, I take it for granted that this is a waiving of proof of loyalty, and as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who reported the bill, is not here——

Mr. BRYAN. No, Mr. President; but——

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps the Senator from Florida can explain the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. The report is very definite. This occurred after the war. Gen. Butler used this property, collected the rents for it, and failed to turn them over to Mr. Semmes. The money was put into the Treasury, and has lain there ever since. I do not know why the heirs of the estate have never made any claim for it before.

Mr. SMOOT. As it is a Senate bill, I shall not object to its consideration.

Mr. BRYAN. I think there is no objection to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH MUHLEMAN.

The bill (H. R. 12191) for the relief of Elizabeth Muhleman, widow of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Elizabeth Muhleman, widow of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased, $1,000, in full compensation for the death of Samuel A. Muhleman on February 14, 1898, caused by injury received on the 9th of June, 1893, while employed as a clerk in the Record and Pension Office, War Department, while located in Ford's Theater at the time of its collapse.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. CLAY HOWARD.

The bill (S. 3437) for the relief of H. Clay Howard was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would suggest that that bill go over, as it is adversely reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not recall what Senator is interested in the bill, but I know that some Senator was interested in it. I should like to have it go over. I am informed the bill was introduced by the late Senator Bradley, of Kentucky. Let it go over, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

F. W. TYLER.

The bill (S. 802) for the relief of F. W. Tyler was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to credit the accounts of F. W. It proposes to appropriate the sum of $53,800 to enable the Secretary of War to pay to the Government of Panama for the use and benefit of the so-called "Malambo fire claimants" the reduced allowances which were recommended to be paid to the said claimants by the joint commission under article 6 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama, as set forth on page 22 of Senate Document No. 148, Sixty-second Congress, second session, by way of compensation for losses suffered by said claimants in and by the fire which was occasioned in the Malambo ward of the city of Panama by the fumigation of houses for sanitary purposes, by order and under the direction of the Isthmian Canal Commission, on or about the 12th day of January, 1906, such payment having been recommended by the President, upon the recommendations of the Secretary of War and the Attorney General, in the special message which was sent by the President to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States on the 13th day of December, 1911 (printed in the aforesaid S. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXPENSES INCURRED UNDER TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 3002) making appropriation for expenses incurred under the treaty of Washington was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not read the bill, but from its title it seems to me it ought to go in an appropriation bill. If there is a deficiency, it ought to go into the general deficiency bill that will be reported to the Senate before very long.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would make it all the stronger if we passed it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, let me state to my friend from Utah that I think it all the more necessary to have it passed here. There can scarcely be anything of that character put on a deficiency bill unless that is done.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if he has read the bill, and whether or not he thinks the claim is a just one?

Mr. WARREN. I did not understand the Senator to make any point about that, but to make the point that it ought to go on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be the second point.

Mr. WARREN. I know nothing about the bill; but if the bill is a proper one, this is the proper place to handle it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] reported the bill. I will ask the Senator if this is a unanimous report?

Mr. BURTON. What is the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a bill making appropriations for expenses incurred under the treaty of Washington.

Mr. BURTON. This is a bill for compensation to one of the secretaries who served during the days of the Alabama Commission, in 1871. The exact amount I have forgotten. The report was made some time ago. Mr. Hackett served as a secretary at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. The language of the bill is:

That the unexpended balance of the appropriation for expenses incurred under the treaty of Washington, being the sum of $831.59, be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated, together with the further sum of $668.41, to enable the Secretary of State to pay to any secretary to the counsel of the United States, as remuneration for services rendered by him in the preparation and trial of the case of the United States at Geneva—

And so forth.

Mr. BURTON. He was secretary for Caleb Cushing, and acted in the preparation of briefs as secretary for Mr. Cushing, and received less compensation than the rest.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a "further sum of $668.41" provided for here. What is that for?

Mr. BURTON. I shall have to look at the bill. I can tell in a minute.

Mr. SMOOT. There are two items. I will ask that the bill be passed over temporarily.

Mr. BURTON. I think it is a deserving claim.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask that it go over now, and we can look it up later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Swift on or about the 15th day of September, 1910, while in the performance of his duties as a clerk in the Post Office Department, employed and assigned to duty in the Canton (Ohio) post office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Samuel H. Walker, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $480, in full compensation for injuries received by the said Samuel H. Walker while performing his duties as a laborer in the fireroom of the General Land Office, Department of the Interior.

The bill (S. 4857) for the relief of the St. Croix Chippewa Indians of Wisconsin was announced as next in order, and the Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. PAGE. Before the reading is completed I should like to ask the chairman, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], if this bill received a unanimous report from the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. GALLINGER. It came from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ASHURST. My recollection is not accurate as to whether there was a unanimous report in favor of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. It did not come from the Senator's committee; it came from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SMOOT. It was reported by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. BRYAN. There is a mistake in the entry on the calendar. It did not come from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill states that it was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. WARREN. The calendar states that it was reported from the Committee on Claims. I think the bill ought to go over until the Senator who reported it is present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

LANDS AT NOGALES, ARIZ.

The bill (S. 105) for the relief of John T. Brickwood, Edward Gaynor, Theodore Gebler, Lee W. Mix, Arthur L. Peck, Thomas D. Casanega, Joseph de Lusignan, and Joseph H. Berger was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The bill has been amended and the sums allowed have been reduced to an almost ridiculous amount. The court very incorrectly, not understanding the case when it was submitted to it, found that these people had no title. Their title is as good as that of any other people in the world who have settled on public lands. There has been an amendment in each of these cases reducing the amount to the mere value of the houses that happened to be upon the property that was worth twenty times what was allowed. I ask, in order to expedite the consideration of the bill, that the amendments be agreed to en bloc, for it is a reduction in every case, and the bill can be speedily disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator on what ground was their property destroyed, and by what order?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. These people in the city of Nogales were close to the border line. They had their houses and their stores on this strip. The Government made an order widening the street 60 feet and took the property of all the people who had been living there for 15 and 20 years, and gave everybody else in town a title to the property. It left these people without a cent, and instead of allowing them anything for the value of the property it allowed them only the value of the little houses that happened to be on the strip of land.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean that the Court of Claims made the allowance?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It was referred to the Court of Claims and the court found that they had no patent from the Government, and then proceeded to make a finding as to the value of these little stores.

Mr. BRYAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that this case was very fully investigated by the Committee on Claims, and a subcommittee of three lawyers was appointed to go into it thoroughly.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have not any objection to the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. The subcommittee reported it back to the full committee after a thorough investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the bill after the explanation of the Senator from Arizona.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments of the Committee on Claims will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments: In line 3, after the name "Brickwood," to strike out "$14,950" and insert "$3,750"; in line 4, after the name "Gaynor," to strike out "$29,000" and insert "$4,250"; in the same line, after the name "Gebler," to strike out "$10,600" and insert "$1,200"; in line 5, after the name "Mix," to strike out "$5,100" and insert "$1,450"; in line 5, after the name "Peck," to strike out "$5,560" and insert "$2,350"; in line 6, after the name "Casanega," to strike out "$900" and insert "$500"; in line 7, after the name "Lusignan," to strike out "$6,125" and insert "$3,250"; and in the same line, after the name "Berger," to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$1,800," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid to John T. Brickwood, $3,750; Edward Gaynor, $4,250; Theodore Gebler, $1,200; Lee W. Mix, $1,450; Arthur L. Peck, $2,350; Thomas D. Casanega, $500; Joseph de Lusignan, $3,250; and Joseph H. Berger, $1,800, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the losses incurred by the destruction, in 1899, of their buildings and other property and their removal by the United States authorities from the premises severally occupied by them on what is commonly called the International Strip, in the town of Nogales, Ariz.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Information has come to me that Mr. Brickwood has recently died. I move to amend the amendment by making it read "to the estate of John T. Brickwood."

Mr. BRYAN. I suggest that the Senator make it read "the legal representatives of John T. Brickwood's estate."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Very well.

The amendment to the amendments was agreed to.

The amendments as amended were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John T. Brickwood, deceased, Edward Gaynor, Theodore Gebler, Lee W. Mix, Arthur L. Peck, Thomas D. Casanega, Joseph de Lusignan, and Joseph H. Berger."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to revise the location of its right of way, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee recommends that the preamble be stricken out. Without objection that will be done.

WILLIAM LISKEY.

It provides that the homestead entry of William Liskey, under the act of June 17, 1902, and the act of February 18, 1911, on the north half of the south half of section 9, township 21 north, range 2 west, Montana meridian, is hereby validated, subject to future compliance with the law.

CONVEYANCES IN NEVADA BY CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The bill (S. 5042) legalizing certain conveyances heretofore made by the Central Pacific Railroad Co. and others within the State of Nevada was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 1, after the word "them," to insert "but without consideration," and in line 8, after the word "fee," to insert the words ", and whenever any such occupancy shall have been permitted by the railroad company and the portion of its right of way so occupied shall have been by it abandoned, the occupant thereof shall be, and he hereby is, granted the title thereto, and patent shall upon proper proof be issued to him for the same," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That wherever any or either of said companies has heretofore suffered or permitted permanent structures or improvements to be erected or maintained upon any part of the railroad right of way above mentioned, it shall be lawful for said companies, or any or either of them, but without consideration, to execute and deliver to the owner or owners of such permanent structures or improvements deed or deeds of conveyance for the lands covered thereby, including such additional lands, if any, as may be reasonably necessary for use in connection therewith, with the same effect as if the lands embraced therein had been originally granted to said companies in fee, and whenever any such occupancy shall have been permitted by the railroad company and the portion of its right of way so occupied shall have been by it abandoned, the occupant thereof shall be, and he hereby is, granted the title thereto, and patent shall upon proper proof be issued to him for the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out sections 3 and 4, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That in all instances, from and after the passage of this act, in which title or ownership of any part of said right of way heretofore mentioned shall hereafter be claimed as against said corporations, or either of them, or the successors or assigns of any of them, by or through adverse possession of the character and duration prescribed by the laws of the State in which the land is situated, such adverse possession shall have the same effect as though the land embraced within the lines of said right of way had been granted by the United States absolutely or in fee instead of being granted as a right of way.

SEC. 4. That any part of the right of way heretofore mentioned which has been, under the law applicable to that subject, abandoned as a right of way is hereby granted to the owner of the land abutting thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That nothing hereinbefore contained shall have the effect to diminish said right of way to a less width than 50 feet on each side of the center of the main track of the railroad as now established and maintained.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVISION OF PUBLIC PRINTING LAWS.

The bill (S. 5340) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHILTON. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from West Virginia if he will not allow the bill to be read to-night.

Mr. CHILTON. No; let it go over.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill provides a saving to the Government of the United States of over $850,000 a year. It means the prevention of the printing of hundreds of thousands of useless documents that are published by the Government and piled up here in the warehouses and at the end of two years sold as old paper for 65 cents a hundred. The useless printing that is going on is a wicked shame. A bill similar to this has already passed the Senate once, and I think it ought to be considered now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHILTON. I have heard all that in the committee and in the Senate. I supposed we were proceeding under the five-minute rule without any discussion. Whenever I am as convinced of what the Senator from Utah says as the Senator is I will not have any objection to the consideration of the bill. I simply have not had time to go into the subject and read it, and I have objection to considering it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

CLAIMS OF SHOSHONE INDIANS IN WYOMING.

The bill (S. 5036) authorizing the Shoshone Tribe of Indians residing on the Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming, to submit claims to the Court of Claims was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 4, line 1, after the words "excess of," to strike out "the amount stipulated in the approved contract nor amount to more than 10 per cent of the amount and value of the judgment recovered in said cause," and to insert "$15,000," so as to read:

Upon the final determination of said cause the Court of Claims shall decree such fees as the court shall find reasonable to be paid to the attorneys employed by said Shoshone Tribe, and the same shall be paid out of any sum or sums found due to said Shoshone Tribe, or out of any sum or sums which may be placed to the credit of said Shoshone Tribe as a result of said cause: Provided, That in no case shall the fees decreed by said court be in excess of $15,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator who reported the bill whether or not the bill provides for the court to proceed to judgment?

Mr. WARREN. I do not so understand from the reading of the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. I did not hear the inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I asked does the bill provide for the Court of Claims proceeding to judgment, or does it merely provide that the court shall ascertain the amount due?

Mr. THOMPSON. It provides that the court shall ascertain the amount due and proceed to judgment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think we should ever do that. I think we ought to let the court ascertain what amount is due, and then let the parties come before Congress. That is the general rule. As I understand, this bill provides that the court shall proceed to judgment.

Mr. THOMPSON. This is a bill which is recommended by the department. It is simply a contest between two Indian tribes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to hear the reading of the part of the bill which covers the point as to which I desire information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

With the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, for determination of the rights of said Shoshone Tribe in and to said reservation and the proceeds and profits therefrom, and for determination of the amounts, if any, of the funds of said Shoshone Tribe which have been wrongfully paid by the United States to the Arapahoe Tribe of Indians residing on said reservation.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to have the bill go over. I wish to consider it.

Mr. THOMPSON. The bill provides that the court shall proceed to judgment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I so understand; and that is a very dangerous way of proceeding for us here in the Senate to pass bills in that shape. When the judgment is rendered we have to make the appropriation whether the case is just or not.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no personal interest in the matter, except to see justice done between these two tribes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from North Carolina will give his attention to the matter at an early date, as the bill has been waiting here for a long time. I should like to bring it up very soon.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is this a bill in which the Senator from Wyoming is interested?

Mr. WARREN. It is. The two tribes of Indians referred to in the bill live in the State of Wyoming.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Wyoming has served with me on the Committee on Claims for some six or eight years, and he knows that the rule was against allowing such matters as this to go into bills.

Mr. WARREN. This may not amount to any money. It is for the purpose of determining the rights as between two tribes of Indians.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not object to that.

Mr. WARREN. One of the tribes has an undoubted right on its reservation in Wyoming, while the other was brought in and located there for the time being. This second tribe has been allowed to remain there for some 40 years, and has been trading back and forth with the other tribe and the United States. It is high time that there should be a determination and adjustment of accounts and a settlement of the case.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to the Court of Claims ascertaining what is due and then allow the matter to come regularly before Congress, as all other claims come. I will look into it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the bill speaks of reimbursing one of the tribes for money wrongfully paid by the United States to another tribe. If the proposition is to pay money out of the Treasury that will be charged up against another tribe which erroneously received the payment——

Mr. WARREN. Indian claims have been handled a little differently from others. I have not sought to go into that, because it is left entirely with the United States in its control of Indian affairs.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. There is quite a difference between mulcting the United States Government for a payment to be made to one tribe of Indians on the theory that it should have been made to another. If the proposition is——

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, let me explain——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have the floor, Mr. President. If the proposition is to make the tribe which erroneously received this sum of money as trustee for the one which should have received it, I do not know but what we might dispose of the matter this evening; but if the proposition is to make the United States Government pay the money twice, then, of course, it ought to be looked into a little further.

Mr. WARREN. It is nothing of that kind; it is a matter of equalization between these two Indian tribes and the United States.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] will look into it at an early day; but objection is made to the consideration of the bill in the meantime.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 13985) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Baton Rouge, La., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

The bill (S. 586) providing for homestead and desert-land entries for such persons as shall have lost, forfeited, or abandoned their former entries, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the word "entered," to strike out the following proviso:

That no person shall be entitled to make entry under this act if a former entry made by him was canceled for fraud, or if he relinquished such entry for a valuable consideration in excess of the filing fees paid on it. Any person applying to make entry under this act shall furnish a description and the date of any entry which he may previously have made.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That such applicant shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the prior entry or entries were made in good faith, were lost, forfeited, or abandoned because of matters beyond his control, and that he has not speculated in his right nor committed a fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such prior entry or entries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1991) correcting the military record of Abram H. Johnson was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1988) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John H. Armstrong was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

CHARLES M. CLARK.

The bill (S. 2882) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Charles M. Clark was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Charles M. Clark, who was a private of Company G, Third Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 17th day of October, 1863: Provided, That other than as above set forth no pay, bounty, pension, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Charles M. Clark."

CHARLES RICHTER.

The bill (S. 145) for the relief of Charles Richter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Charles Richter, alias Herman Wittman, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company K, Thirty-fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, but no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JACOB SCOTT.

The bill (S. 2550) to correct the military record of Jacob Scott was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator who introduced this bill if there has been any report from the War Department setting forth the record of this man?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think there was a report from the department sent to the Military Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice that in the report submitted by the committee there is nothing said as to any information received from the department.

Mr. THOMPSON. There was a report, which showed, as I recall, the facts as disclosed by the official records. The records show his service to have been about two years; but I think he served even longer than that, and his desertions were occasioned on account of sickness and carelessness in not properly looking after the company records.

Mr. BRYAN. How many times did he desert?

Mr. THOMPSON. The records show that he deserted twice, and each time he was sick and did not report to his company; that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask that this bill go over to-day. I should like to see what the department's record actually shows.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope the Senator from Utah will withdraw the objection in this case. Mr. Scott is a worthy man. I wish the Senator would at least read the report.

Mr. SMOOT. I have read the report of the committee. What I desire to know is what the department reports the man's record to be. The report of the committee simply says that the record shows that he was enrolled and mustered out, and after that the record further shows that he was enrolled October 15, 1863. The Senator, as I understand, says this man had a service of about two years; but the records do not show that, and there seems to be a misunderstanding all around regarding the facts of the case.

Mr. THOMPSON. The records show that Scott served 11 months and 23 days during his first enlistment and 11 months in his second enlistment. The evidence is conclusive, so far as that is concerned, from the officers of the company, that both desertions were due to sickness or disease, which was greatly aggravated by exposure and the hardships incident to the service. As I have said, it is a very worthy case, and I hope the Senator from Utah will withdraw any objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator personally know the man?

Mr. THOMPSON. I know of him by reputation; I do not know him personally.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that it is not a very good thing to pass a relief bill of this character for a man without having some information from the department as to what the records of the department disclose as to the cause of his deserting, his excuse for deserting, and so forth.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the report shows those facts.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the only report I have noticed where that information has not been given to the Senate.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to ask the Senator a question. What is the difference between a bill "to correct a military record of Jacob Scott" and a bill "for the relief of Jacob Scott," as these bills are entitled as they are reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can explain that to the Senator.

Mr. BRYAN. I notice the committee recommends that the title of this bill be amended so as to read "A bill for the relief of Jacob Scott." As the bill was introduced the title was "To correct the military record of Jacob Scott."

Mr. SMOOT. If the soldier was an actual deserter, the record can not be corrected, because it shows the actual facts.

Mr. BRYAN. Then the record is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. A bill for his relief means that, while he was a deserter, we shall not consider him as such, so far as the pension laws are concerned. The bill gives him a pensionable status.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will say that this bill was very thoroughly considered by the subcommittee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senators who introduce bills of this character frame them in different language, and the committee has adopted the uniform rule of making them correspond with each other. I might state further that the War Department says they can not correct their records. So that these bills simply give a pensionable status to the soldier affected and his record remains the same all the time. The act of Congress does not enable the War Department to go back over the record and correct the record, no matter what the defect may be, whether in the case of desertion or otherwise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws Jacob Scott, who was a private of Company B, Fourth Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that company and regiment on the 8th day of March, 1863, and as a member of Company M, Second Regiment Arkansas Volunteer Cavalry, on the 15th day of December, 1864, but no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Jacob Scott."

DESECRATION OF THE FLAG.

The bill (S. 1905) to prevent the desecration of the flag of the United States of America, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person or persons, corporation, or company who shall use the flag or coat of arms of the United States, or any pattern, imitation, or representation thereof, either by printing thereon or attaching thereto any advertisement or device for the purpose of gain or profit, or as a trade-mark or label, or who shall imitate or represent the flag or coat of arms of the United States for an advertisement, trade-mark, or label shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 2. That no copyright shall subsist in the flag or coat of arms or other insignia of the United States or any simulation thereof.

SEC. 3. That no device or inscription nor the representation or image of any person or thing shall be imprinted upon, painted upon, or attached to the flag or upon or to the coat of arms of the United States.

SEC. 4. That any person or persons, who shall tear down, trample upon, or treat with indignity, or wantonly destroy the flag or coat of arms of the United States shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 5. That any person, corporation, or company violating any provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year.

SEC. 6. That it is hereby made the duty of any United States district attorney to cause forthwith the arrest and prosecution of any person or persons charged with the violation of any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage and publication.

SEC. 8. That this act shall not apply to banners or flags carried by military or patriotic organizations authorized by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. TEMPLIN MORRIS POTTS.

The bill (S. 3804) for the relief of Templin Morris Potts, captain on the retired list of the United States Navy, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I know nothing against the record of Capt. Potts; but we had a long hearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs on this bill, and, so far as I am personally concerned, I will say that I voted against the bill, because I did not believe, after organizing a board for the purpose of examining into the records of naval officers, with a view to creating the vacancies made necessary by the Navy personnel act, and after the matters brought before the board had been fairly and fully considered—and it was confessed by the friends of Capt. Potts that his case was fairly considered—that the Senate of the United States or the Committee on Naval Affairs should be made a board to rehear and review all such cases.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. PAGE. If we are to have a board of this kind, and they are to consider and act upon cases as required by law, it seems to me that, the board having acted upon them, we ought not then to disregard their action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill goes over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one word, Mr. President. The Senator from Vermont surely does not mean to say that if it appears that a case was not fairly considered, that the records were not all before the board, and various other things that might happen, we ought not to take cognizance of it?

Mr. PAGE. I do not want to object, Mr. President, to the consideration of this bill. Perhaps it ought to be considered now. I simply say that, in my opinion, there ought not to be any general practice of passing these cases after they have been once considered unless, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, it is shown that the action of the board was unfair. No man can claim the action in this case was unfair, as I understand, unless he impeaches the integrity of the board; and I know I took especial pains to ask one who was discussing the matter, "Do we have any authority to say from you that this board did not design to treat this matter fairly?" They said they thought they tried to do right and justly by this man, but they thought the board had made a mistake. Now, if we are to open all of these cases, we might as well say that the Committee on Naval Affairs may be excused from every other line of business and take up these cases and sit as a plucking board.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CHILTON. I did not understand that any objection was made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I objected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; objection was made, and the bill will be passed over.

LAND IN NOXUBEE COUNTY, MISS.

The bill (H. R. 6831) to quiet title to lot 5, section 33, township 14, range 18 east, Noxubee County, Miss., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to lot 5, section 33, township 14, range 18 east, in the State of Mississippi, for which no confirmation has heretofore been granted and no patent has been issued, be, and the same are hereby, granted, released, and relinquished by the United States to the owners of the equitable title thereto and to their heirs and assigns forever, as fully and completely in every respect whatever as could be done by patents issued therefor according to law: Provided, That the confirmation granted hereby shall amount only to a relinquishment of any title that the United States has or is supposed to have in and to said land, and shall not be construed to abridge, impair, injure, prejudice, or divest in any manner any valid right, title, or interest of any person or body corporate whatever, the true intent of this act being to concede and abandon all right, title, and interest of the United States to those persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the true and lawful owners of said land under the laws of Mississippi, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of the said interest, title, and estate of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to V. E. Schermerhorn, E. C. Caley, G. W. Campbell, and Philip Hudspeth, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the following sums: V. E. Schermerhorn, $2,767.45; E. C. Caley, $192; G. W. Campbell, $16; and Philip Hudspeth, $134, for the destruction on October 15, 1908, of their property by fire which occurred on the Fort Riley (Kans.) Military Reservation while Battery A, Sixth Field Artillery, was engaged in target practice, near the northern boundary, and which spread to and caused serious damage to privately owned farms adjoining the reservation; and the sum of $3,109.45 is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments were agreed to.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 146) for the relief of Aaron Kibler, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 9829) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused remnant lands to the Board of County Commissioners of Caddo County, Okla., for fairground and park purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let the bill go over.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I appeal to the Senator who made the objection to withdraw it and let the bill be considered. It is a very simple bill, and it is badly needed. It was unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands. Representative FERRIS, of Oklahoma, the chairman of the House Committee on Public Lands, is very anxious to have it passed. There is no harm in the bill, and I appeal to the Senator who made the objection to withdraw it.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I think the bill should be passed. The people in that section of the country, I am informed by Mr. FERRIS, are preparing for a great agricultural fair and alfalfa exhibition this fall. They are hesitating about putting up the necessary buildings until this bill is passed. There is not the slightest objection to it, I understand.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. KERN. House bill 9829; Order of Business 407.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it Indian land?

Mr. MEYERS. No; these are United States Government lands, as I understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Montana if the price named, $1.25 an acre, is not a very low price for lands out of which to make an agricultural park?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I think.

Mr. MYERS. That is all that the Department of the Interior suggested should be paid. The department which is versed in the premises considers that that is all it is worth, and no question has been raised about the price.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will ask to have the bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this in a settled country that has been populated and filled up with farms?

Mr. MYERS. I can not say from personal knowledge. It is in Caddo County, Okla. Here is the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked the Senator the question because it would seem that where the country is sufficiently settled to be used as a fairground and for park purposes the land ought to be worth more than $1.25 an acre.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it is a self-evident fact that——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MYERS. I am appealing to the Senator to withdraw the objection, if I may be indulged for a second or so. He may withdraw the objection if I can answer the question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator was conducting a colloquy with the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MYERS. But he asked a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Another Senator objected, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the objection withdrawn or not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

GEORGE GARDELLS.

The bill (H. R. 1291) for the relief of George Gardells was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of pension laws, George Gardells shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as private in Company B, Fifth Regiment, New York Volunteer Cavalry, on the 19th day of April, 1864: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 717) to correct the military record of Thomas Smart was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, there does not seem to be any report on this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report is No. 482.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that in the report there is no reason——

Mr. BRYAN. There is a report No. 482, but it does not say anything except that it recommends the passage of the bill. It does not say why the record of this man should be corrected. This may be another one of those records that is correct already.

Mr. DU PONT. I ask that the bill may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 5495) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHILTON. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the establishment of fish-cultural stations on the Columbia River or its tributaries in the State of Oregon or Washington, or both."

ESTATE OF JOHN G. CAMPBELL.

The bill (S. 2661) for the relief of the administrator and heirs of John G. Campbell, to permit the prosecution of Indian depredation claims, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHILTON. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not know what Senator made the objection, but I wish to appeal to him, whoever he may be, to withdraw his objection, for this reason: Mr. Campbell was a Delegate to Congress from the Territory of Arizona. Long after he was a Delegate he discovered that he was not a citizen. The bill simply restores him to the status, if he were alive, of a citizen, and thereby authorizing him to institute a suit for claims which his estate alleges to have. In other words, it simply gives him a citizenship status before the Court of Claims.

Mr. CHILTON. I withdraw the objection, Mr. President.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It relieves the estate of John C. Campbell, deceased, who was a Delegate to the House of Representatives from Arizona in the Forty-sixth Congress, and who became a resident of the United States at a very early age and supposed himself to have become a citizen by the naturalization of his father, from any disability under the laws of the United States and from any defect of naturalization, and the administrator of said estate is hereby authorized to prosecute Indian depredation claim No. 2925, now pending in the United States Court of Claims, and to receive judgment therein the same as if the said John G. Campbell had been naturalized under the laws of the United States at the date of the loss alleged; and for this purpose the said Court of Claims is vested with full jurisdiction.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

To enable such appeal to be taken and perfected the time therefor and for all notices and proceedings provided in the law or practice to be given or taken is hereby extended until the expiration of the period of 90 days from and after the passage of this act.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Me-yone-yah, a Nez Perce Indian, or the legal representative of said Indian, the sum of $2,400, upon the execution by said Indian, or his legal representative, of a proper quitclaim deed in relinquishment of all right and title of said Indian in and to the west half of the northeast quarter of section 15, township 31 north, range 3 east, Boise meridian, under allotment No. 1287, so that there shall be no conflict by reason of such allotment with the claim of one Clarence Hazelbaker to such land by virtue of homestead patent No. 152479, issued to the said Hazelbaker by the General Land Office of the United States September 15, 1910: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated shall only be paid out in sums from time to time upon the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 353, to print the manuscript entitled "Effect of Panama Canal on Sea Traffic," by Mr. Russell L. Dunn, of San Francisco, as a Senate document.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the resolution may go over.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to appeal to the Senator from Mississippi. It may be supposed that this has something to do with the tolls question, but it has not. It contains a great deal of data about distances to foreign and domestic ports that I think valuable. I do not see any reason why the Senator should object to it in that view.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not object at all. I just asked that the resolution might go over, because I knew nothing about it and what it pertains to. I did rather suspect that it had something to do with the recent controversy about Panama Canal tolls. If not, I have no objection. I had no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by Mr. WORKS on April 1, 1914, entitled "Effect of the Panama Canal on Sea Traffic," by Mr. Russell L. Dunn, of San Francisco, Cal., be printed as a Senate document.

COL. DAVID L. BRAINARD.

The bill (S. 5293) for the promotion and retirement of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes, in view of the conspicuous service in the Arctic of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, he being one of the 7 survivors of the original 25 members of the Greely Expedition, and of the injury to his eyesight resulting from exposure while in the service, which injury will necessitate his early retirement from active service, the President is authorized to place that officer on the retired list of the Army, after 38 years' active service, as a brigadier general, with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer of that grade, and to grant him a commission in accordance with such advanced rank.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that the report of the committee on that bill, including the letter of the Secretary of War, may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 5293:

The Committee on Military Affairs, which has had under consideration the bill (S. 5293) for the promotion and retirement of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, reports the same to the Senate favorably and without amendment, and recommends that it be passed.

As the text of the bill recites, it is proposed to authorize the President to place Col. Brainard on the retired list of the Army, after 38 years of active service, as a brigadier general, with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer of that grade, and to grant him a commission in accordance with such advanced rank, as a reward or recognition of the officer's conspicuous service in the Arctic, he being one of the 7 survivors of the original 25 members of the Greely expedition, and, furthermore, because of the necessity of his early retirement from active service on account of injury to his eyesight resulting from exposure while in the service above mentioned.

David L. Brainard enlisted as a private in the Second United States Cavalry in September, 1876, and served in that organization as private, corporal, and sergeant until July 31, 1884. On August 1, 1884, he was transferred to the Signal Corps as sergeant, in which capacity he served until October 21, 1886, when he was commissioned as a second lieutenant of Cavalry in recognition of gallant and meritorious services rendered by him in the Greely Arctic Expedition of 1881–1884. The honorable Secretary of War reports, in a letter dated April 22, 1914, which will be quoted in full hereafter in this report, that "Col. Brainard is the only officer now on the active list of the Army who received his commission for distinguished services."

Upon reaching his captaincy, Col. Brainard became an officer in the Subsistence Department of the Army (lately made a part of the Quartermaster Corps), and his service has since been in connection with the commissary affairs of the Army, including service with the Volunteer Army during the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection.

A more complete and detailed record of Col. Brainard's service is given in the letter of the honorable Secretary of War, above referred to, and a memorandum prepared by the War Department, followed by comments thereon by the Judge Advocate General of the Army. These communications constitute an appendix to this report.

Your committee is of the opinion that Congress, by enacting the proposed legislation and permitting a promotion of one grade upon retirement for disability and after long active service, would confer upon Col. Brainard a fitting tribute of appreciation and acknowledgment of his service as a pioneer explorer in the Arctic regions. It can not be gainsaid that each expedition made to that unknown country of ice fields held forth its certain proportion of encouragement to the next body of explorers, and hence played its part in the final discovery of the North Pole by an American.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 22, 1914.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: Referring to S. 5293, Sixty-third Congress, second session, a bill authorizing the President to place Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, on the retired list of the Army as a brigadier general, which bill was referred to this department for information and remark, I have the honor to inform you as follows:

Col. Brainard has reached his present high rank as colonel in the Quartermaster Corps through all of the noncommissioned and commissioned grades since his enlistment in the Army as a private in the Second Cavalry in 1876. He received his commission as a second lieutenant in 1886 in recognition of gallant and meritorious services rendered by him in the Greely Arctic Expedition of 1881–1884. In addition to his conspicuous services in the Arctic regions, for which he was partly rewarded by promotion to a second lieutenancy, Col. Brainard took part in Indian wars on the Plains and was wounded in right hand and face in action against Sioux Indians on Little Muddy Creek, Mont., May 7, 1877. Col. Brainard also participated in the taking of Manila August 13, 1898, and in the Filipino insurrection of 1899.

Col. Brainard is the only officer now on the active list of the Army who received his commission for distinguished services. During this service with the Greely Arctic Expedition he made the record for farthest north and which stood so until the Norwegian explorer, Nansen, 14 years later, temporarily set a higher latitude, which finally resulted in Admiral Peary gaining the world-coveted honor of the North Pole for America.

For these reasons, and the further reason that as a result of this Arctic expedition Col. Brainard suffers a permanent injury to his eyesight from exposure in said service, I recommend the passage of this bill.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

AARON S. WINNER.

The bill (S. 725) to correct the military record of Aaron S. Winner was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

So as to make the bill read:

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out the numerals "$214,723.62" and to insert "$100,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Virginia Military Institute, of Lexington, Va., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, in full of all claims of said institute for the damage and destruction of its library, scientific apparatus, and the quarters of its professors in June, 1864, by the military authority of the United States. And the acceptance of the said sum by the said institute shall be a complete and absolute bar to any and all claims for the damage and destruction of the property of said institute by the armies of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD the report of the committee in reference to the bill which has just been passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

The report referred to is as follows:

Mr. BRYAN, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany Senate bill 544:

The Committee on Claims, having had under consideration the bill (S. 544) for the relief of the Virginia Military Institute, of Lexington, Va., report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendment:

In line 6 strike out "$214,723.62" and insert "$100,000."

On June 11, 1864, Gen. Hunter's army arrived at Lexington, Va., on its way to Lynchburg. On its arrival at Lexington it was discovered that some troops were gathered at the cadet barracks of the Virginia Military Institute. They fired upon Gen. Hunter's army. Six shots were fired in return, when an order to cease firing was received because the barracks had been evacuated. Gen. Hunter's army crossed over and took possession of the town and, on the following day, June 12, the library and other college buildings, including the professors' houses, were burned. Gen. Hunter's report (H. Mis. Doc., 1st sess. 52d Cong., vol. 13) contains the following:

"On the 12th I also burned the Virginia Military Institute and all the buildings connected with it."

Senator DU PONT, who was chief of artillery of Gen. Hunter's army, appeared before the committee and stated the facts connected with the burning of this institution in detail. We insert at this point affidavit of J. M. Schoonmaker:

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Allegheny, ss:

On this 10th day of March, A. D. 1914, personally appeared before me, the subscriber, a notary public, J. M. Schoonmaker, of Pittsburgh, Pa., who, being duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say:

I was colonel of the Fourteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, in command of the First Brigade of Averill's Cavalry Division, and led the advance of Gen. Hunter's army when he moved south from Staunton on June 11, 1864, on what is known as Hunter's raid on Lynchburg. On arriving at the outskirts of Lexington there was some firing from skirmishers, which halted us until Gen. Hunter came to the front and ordered the shelling of the Virginia Military Institute buildings, but with no response following same. I moved into Lexington, picketing the road south of same, and my recollection is that I was the first one to enter the institute building, finding the cadets' school books open on their desks and diagrams partly finished on blackboard, and no trace of the building having been occupied by Confederate forces; placed it and the Washington College buildings under guard. Some time afterwards Gen. Hunter advanced his main army into Lexington and sent for me, taking me severely to task for not having burned the institute, which he did the following day, and it was my understanding at the time that Gen. Hunter also intended burning the Washington College buildings. I have no hesitation in stating that I considered at the time the burning of the institute for military reasons unnecessary and unwarranted.

And further the deponent saith not.

J. M. SCHOONMAKER.

Sworn and subscribed before me the day and year first above written.

WM. F. BRUNNER, Notary Public.

My commission expires January 19, 1915.

The cost of replacing the buildings burned was $137,000. The new buildings were constructed upon the foundations of the old and were of like character, value, and material, but inasmuch as they replaced old buildings, the allowance is for $37,000 less than the cost of the buildings replaced.

The Virginia Military Institute was established in 1838. The course of instruction is modeled after that at West Point. During its existence it has drawn its student body from the entire country. At the present time 40 of the 48 States are represented at the institution. In the Mexican War it had 14 officers in the United States service. In the Civil War there were officers in both the Union and Confederate Armies. Its value as a military institution has been attested by President McKinley and Gen. Wood, Chief of Staff, and others. It seems fair to assert, from the testimony, that this institution ranks next to West Point. The bill carries no appropriation for replacing the barracks. It is conceded, for the purposes of this bill, that it was entirely proper to destroy the barracks, but the destruction of other college buildings is not thought to have been justified, either under the rules of civilized warfare or under the specific instructions for the government of the armies of the United States in the Civil War.

Halleck, in his work on international law, says:

"All structures of a civil character, all public edifices devoted to civil purposes only, all temples of religion, monuments of art, and repositories of science are to be exempt from the operations of war."

Paragraphs 31 and 34 of the instructions for the government of the United States Army in the Civil War read as follows:

"31. A victorious army appropriates all public money, seizes all public movable property until further direction by its Government, and sequesters for its own benefit or of that of its Government all the revenues of real property belonging to the hostile Government or nation. The title to such real property remains in abeyance during military occupation and until the conquest is made complete.

"34. As a general rule, the property belonging to churches, to hospitals, or other establishments of an exclusively charitable character, to establishments of education, or foundations for the promotion of knowledge, whether public schools, universities, academies of learning, or observatories, museums of fine arts, or of a scientific character—such property is not to be considered public property in the sense of paragraph 31; but it may be taxed or used when the public service may require it."

Article 56 of The Hague convention provides:

"The property of the communes, that of religious, charitable, and educational institutions, and those of arts and science, even when State property, shall be treated as private property.

"All seizure of, and destruction, or intentional damage done to such institutions, to historical monuments, works of art or science, is prohibited, and should be made the subject of proceedings."

By an act of March 2, 1895, Washington College was reimbursed for property destroyed at the same time by Gen. Hunter's army, and there are many other instances in which Congress has made provision for repairing the damage done under similar circumstances.

FIRST LIEUT. JAMES P. BARNEY.

The bill (H. R. 9147) to restore First Lieut. James P. Barney, retired, to the active list of the Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to restore First Lieut. James P. Barney, retired, to the active list of the Army of the United States with the rank of first lieutenant of Cavalry, his name to appear on the active list of the Army of the United States next below that of First Lieut. Francis H. Ruggles; but the number of officers shall not be increased by reason of the passage of this act; and prior to his restoration to the active list this officer shall pass a physical examination for promotion to the grade of first lieutenant, as prescribed by regulations of the War Department under the terms of the act of Congress approved October 1, 1890.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARCUS P. NORTON'S STAMP PATENT.

The bill (S. 1269) for the adjudication and determination of the claims arising under joint resolution of July 14, 1870, authorizing the Postmaster General to continue in use in the postal service Marcus P. Norton's combined postmarking and stamp-canceling hand-stamp patents, or otherwise, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, that bill should have been referred to the Committee on Claims, instead of to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I object to its consideration to-night. It has been pending before the Committee on Claims for over 20 years, and I do not see why it was referred at this time to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I object to its consideration for the present.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. NELSON. It was first referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and afterwards referred to the Committee on Claims, as all such bills have uniformly been considered by that committee. It was fully considered.

Mr. BRISTOW. It was before the Committee on Claims at one time, I think, and it has been reported adversely a number of times. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to call the Senator's attention to this claim. It has been recommended by the Postmaster General for a good many years, and there is no question about its merits. The committee has allowed a sum that is so exceedingly small that there is no doubt much more than that is really due. The Government has had the use of the device for which the claim is made from the time it was invented. This man was not in the employ of the Government at all at the time the invention was taken, and he was put off in a suit that he brought on the promise that he would be cared for. The matter has been pending for a long time, and I wish the bill might be passed.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let it go over to-night, and I will look into it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

CLAIMS OF THE UNITED STATES AGAINST TENNESSEE.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 65) to amend Senate joint resolution 8, approved May 4, 1898, entitled "Joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States," was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

LIEUT. JAMES P. BARNEY.

The bill (S. 3404) to restore First Lieut. James P. Barney, retired, to the active list of the Army was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A House bill of the same title has just been passed. In the absence of objection, the Senate bill, the title of which has just been read by the Secretary, will be indefinitely postponed. The Chair hears no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

IMMIGRATION STATION AT BALTIMORE, MD.

The bill (S. 5570) to increase the appropriation for the erection of an immigration station at Baltimore, Md., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, since that bill has been reported a similar bill has passed the House. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report the House bill, and ask that it be substituted for the Senate bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia makes a report.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reports favorably the bill (H. R. 11625) to increase the appropriation for the erection of an immigration station at Baltimore, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the House bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill. It proposes to amend section 29 of the public building act approved March 4, 1913, providing for an immigration station at Baltimore, Md., so as to increase the limit of cost from $280,000 to $550,000.

Mr. SMOOT. This bill, I understand, passed the House and was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate?

Mr. SWANSON. It passed the House of Representatives. They sent a committee to Baltimore to investigate this matter. The department has recommended $600,000 for the erection of an immigrant station and hospital in the city of Baltimore. Thirty-three thousand people came there last year as immigrants. This is a very urgent matter, because they have endeavored for years to get a location for an immigrant station there, and they have been compelled to abandon the location and get another. The House passed this as an emergency measure. It was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, and I have been directed by that committee to report this bill as a substitute for the Senate bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the indefinite postponement of Senate bill 5570.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

MINE RESCUE STATION AT M'ALESTER, OKLA.

The bill (H. R. 3988) for the purchase of a building and lot as a mine rescue station at McAlester, Okla., was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will let me explain that bill before he makes the objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think a bill of this kind should be passed. The matter ought to go on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will listen a minute he will see the urgency of this bill. There is a rescue station there at this time. The Government pays $40 a month for the mine rescue station. It cost $10,000. The people who own it are willing to let the Government have it free. They owe $5,500 on it. The people who got it up by private subscription are willing to turn over the land, building, and everything to the Government if it will pay the debt of $5,500. The Government, as I say, pays $40 a month rent. It is different from other bills along that line. It has passed the House, and is a very urgent measure, and I hope the Senator will not object to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not like to see the Senate make an appropriation in this way. It ought to go on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SWANSON. It is utterly impossible to do so unless there is an authorization. I do not see any reason why, when these people liberally and generously erect a building for the benefit of the Government——

Mr. OVERMAN. We will have an appropriation bill here in a short time.

Mr. SWANSON. This bill has passed the House.

Mr. OVERMAN. I withdraw the objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to purchase, for and on behalf of the United States, the following-described real estate in the city of McAlester, county of Pittsburg, State of Oklahoma, to wit, the north 50 feet of lot No. 2, in block No. 487, in the original town site of South McAlester, the dimensions of said lot being 50 feet by 165 feet, with 50 feet front on South Third Street, in said city of McAlester, together with the two-story brick building and all other improvements thereon, for the use of the Bureau of Mines for a mine rescue station and for such other purposes as the Bureau of Mines may from time to time desire to use the same, at and for the sum of $5,500, which said sum is appropriated for such purchase out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL BUILDING AT MANDAN, N. DAK.

The bill (H. R. 11254) to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States post-office building at Mandan, N. Dak., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in order to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to erect, complete, and furnish the post-office building at Mandan, State of North Dakota, provided for in existing legislation, the limit of cost heretofore fixed by Congress, be increased in and by the sum of $11,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to enter into contract for the erection and completion of the building within the limit of cost herein established.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL BUILDING AT MEMPHIS, TENN.

The bill (H. R. 11747) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the construction of a public building in Memphis, Tenn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the provisions of the public building act approved March 4, 1913, authorizing the acquisition of a site of a new subpost-office building in Memphis, State of Tennessee, so as to change the limit of cost heretofore fixed from $40,000 to a limit of cost of $00,000; and that any unexpended balance of this appropriation is hereby made available for the building, and that the sum of $50,000 is appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, under said new limit.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. 14330) to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part, or in any manner manipulated, by convict or prison labor was announced as next in order.

That the lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak., which on account of their containing coal were reserved from allotment and other disposition under the act of June 1, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize the survey and allotment of lands embraced within the limits of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus lands after allotment, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect," shall be subject to disposal under the provisions of said act: Provided, That patents issued for such lands shall contain a reservation to the United States of any coal that such lands may contain, to be held in trust for the Indians belonging to and having tribal rights on the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, but any entryman shall have the right at any time before making final proof of his entry, or at the time of making such final proof, to a hearing for the purpose of disproving the classification as coal land of the land embraced in his entry, and if such land is shown not to be coal land a patent without reservation shall issue.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with an amendment, in section 2, page 2, line 15, after the word "road," to insert: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall not be authorized under the provisions of this section to grant any land which may control any water power or which contains any mineral or oil; And provided further, That whenever any right of way granted under the provisions of this act shall pass through any gorge the said right of way shall not exceed 50 feet in width, and shall contain a provision in the grant authorizing and permitting the common use by other railroads of the track on said right of way passing through any such gorge, upon such terms and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide," so as to make the section read:

ACQUIRING OF LANDS BY RAILROAD COMPANIES THROUGH INDIAN RESERVATIONS, ETC.

The bill (S. 3899) to provide for the acquiring of additional lands by railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. POINDEXTER. Let that bill go over.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I appeal to the Senator who made the objection to withdraw it and ask that the bill may be read. I think a reading of the bill will show that it is perfectly harmless and well safeguarded and that it is necessary.

I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was one of the Senators who asked that it go over. I am perfectly willing to have it read. I reserve the right to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

AVIATION SERVICE, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The bill (H. R. 5304) to increase the efficiency of the aviation service of the Army, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in section 2, page 2, line 8, before the word "engaged," to strike out "exclusively," so as to read:

That, in addition to such officers and enlisted men as shall be assigned from the Signal Corps at large to executive, administrative, scientific, or other duty in or for the aviation section, there shall be in said section aviation officers not to exceed 60 in number, and 260 aviation enlisted men of all grades; and said aviation officers and aviation enlisted men, all of whom shall be engaged on duties pertaining to said aviation section, shall be additional to the officers and enlisted men now allotted by law to the Signal Corps, the commissioned and enlisted strengths of which are hereby increased accordingly.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is one slight amendment that I desire to offer. On page 6, line 4, after the word "men," I desire to insert the words "at a time." The way the bill reads now is:

Provided, That 12 enlisted men shall, in the discretion—

I desire to amend that so that it shall read "twelve enlisted men at a time shall," and so forth. The way it is now it simply confines the instruction to 12 enlisted men of that age. I want the officers to have the right to give this instruction to 12 enlisted men at a time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 4, after the word "men," it is proposed to insert the words "at a time."

ESTATE OF JOHN ROBINSON, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 5674) confirming the title of Hannah Robinson to certain lands and authorizing and directing the issuance of patent therefor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Washington if these are Indian lands?

Mr. JONES. Yes; they were allotments. They were sold by the Indian about 13 years ago to this party. The Indian received his title under the act of 1865, under which he would have gotten his fee-simple title in five years, but the department contends it was a mistake to issue a patent under that act. The case is now pending in the courts, which will really determine the question. The land was sold. The department investigated the matter carefully and found the full value of the land which these parties have occupied for 12 or 13 years. The department recommended it, and the committee investigated it very carefully. It is merely to confirm title to the heirs.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason why I asked the question was that if this had been public land, of course——

Mr. JONES. No; it was not public land. It was allotted land.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The amendment was, on page 2, line 2, to strike out the name "Hannah Robinson"; and, in the same line, after the word "widow," to insert "and heirs," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the conveyance from John Teoul and his wife, Susan, to John Robinson of the west half of the southwest quarter of section 26, township 18 north, range 18 east of the Willamette meridian, Washington, made and executed on the 23d day of May, 1903, be, and the same hereby is, approved, ratified, and confirmed, and as an evidence of such conveyance the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent in fee simple for the said described lands to the widow and heirs of John Robinson, deceased, the purchaser of said lands.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let that go over.

Mr. CHILTON. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not ask that the resolution shall go over, for the reason that it was introduced by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is away, and it is a document the committee thought of great historical interest.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not of any more historical interest than Dr. Kane's arctic expedition and research. It would be just publishing pure literature.

Mr. CHILTON. If the Senator objects, I can not help it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

Gilson, widow of the late Thomas J. Gilson, deceased, of Elephant Butte, N. JOHN W. HYATT.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to know what disposition was made of the bill (H. R. 4744) to authorize the appointment of John W. Hyatt to the grade of second lieutenant in the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It went over on objection.

Mr. SWANSON. I was listening and I do not know who objected to the bill. I ask that it be taken up. I am satisfied that if the Senator who objected would read the report he would not object to the consideration of the bill. I ask that the question be resubmitted and let us see if there was not a mistake about the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill went over on objection. If the objection is withdrawn——

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator who objected to the consideration of the bill will allow me to make a short statement in reference to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not see why this bill should go over any more than others. The bill has passed the House of Representatives and has been unanimously reported by the Military Committee of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be read. I think it was objected to without being read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the bill has been read. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4744) to authorize the appointment of John W. Hyatt to the grade of second lieutenant in the Army. It authorizes the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint John W. Hyatt, late a second lieutenant in the Sixteenth Regiment United States Infantry, to the grade of second lieutenant in the United States Army; but that prior to such appointment he shall pass, in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War, the physical examination required of candidates for appointment as second lieutenant.

THOMAS COYLE.

The bill (S. 770) for the relief of Thomas Coyle and Bridget Coyle and their legal representatives was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas Coyle the sum of $1,200, on account of the death of his child on the 10th day of March, 1887, caused by a large rock being hurled by an excessive blast of powder through the roof of their house at Cascade Locks, Oreg., during the construction of the canal and locks under the direction of the Government of the United States at that point.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Thomas Coyle."

ELLEN B. MONAHAN.

The bill (S. 489) for the relief of Ellen B. Monahan was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. I move that that bill be indefinitely postponed. It is reported adversely.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON GLICK.

The resolution (S. Res. 402) relative to exercises appropriate to the reception and acceptance from the State of Kansas of the statue of George Washington Glick (special order for Saturday, July 18, 1914) was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That seems to have been heretofore agreed to. The Chair does not know why it is on the calendar. The resolution will go over.

MARY ABEL.

The bill (H. R. 5079) for the relief of Mary Abel was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay $1,000 to Mary Abel, mother of August Abel, who was fatally injured by reason of a defective elevator while engaged in the employment of the United States Government at Rock Island Arsenal, Ill., on the 24th of February, 1905, and died the following day on account of said injury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF PHILIP FELIX HERWIG.

Aufdemorte while employed in the Subtreasury, as stated on page 5 of House Document No. 721, Sixty-first Congress, second session, and the claim is remitted and satisfied.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE IN COLORADO.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) to determine the rights of the State of Colorado and of its citizens in the beneficial uses of waters of the Rio Grande and its tributaries within the boundaries of Colorado, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the Senator from Texas will permit that joint resolution to be passed. It is a matter of great importance to the people of the State which I in part represent. The only purpose of the joint resolution is to determine conditionally the extent to which we can use waters which, under the constitution of the State, are given to us. It does not affect the rights of other States.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In view of that statement, I will withdraw my objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall have to renew the objection. I think the joint resolution does, or may, involve a legislative construction which may result in involving the rights of other States to water.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The bill simply refers the matter to be determined by the United States courts. It can not possibly work any wrong, because the United States courts will retain jurisdiction and determine the question. Surely the United States ought to be willing to submit a controversy to its own courts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

HYACINTHE VILLENEUVE.

The bill (H. R. 6260) for the relief of Hyacinthe Villeneuve was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that upon the filing in the Department of the Interior of a proper reconveyance to the United States, previously recorded in the county wherein the land lies, of the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 15, township 162 north, range 57 west, fifth principal meridian, in the Devils Lake (N. Dak.) land district, accompanied by a duly certified abstract showing title in the United States, free of liens and encumbrances, the party or parties making such reconveyance shall be entitled to select, in lieu of said tract, 40 acres of unreserved, vacant, surveyed, nonmineral, and unoccupied public lands; but the selection made under such exchange shall be made within two years after the approval of this act; and upon the acceptance by the Secretary of the Interior of such reconveyance of the land, the patent issued therefor to the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Co. shall be canceled and the homestead entry made for said land on December 5, 1908, by Hyacinthe Villeneuve passed to patent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

CHARLES R. GRANT.

The bill (H. R. 6464) to muster in and muster out Charles R. Grant, late of the Volunteer Army, Civil War, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will withdraw that objection. I may say with respect to the bill that Charles R. Grant is a judge of the Circuit Court of Appeals of Ohio. He had a very active experience, as the report in his case will show, during the war as a boy. He was not of the age which would permit of his being mustered into the service at that time. The bill carries no pension at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was of the impression that the bill before the Senate was the veterinary bill, but I have just been informed that that bill has already gone over. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Senator.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Charles R. Grant shall hereafter be held and considered to have been in the military service of the United States as a member of Company F, Twelfth Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, and to have been honorably discharged therefrom: Provided, however, That this act shall not confer upon him any right to pay, annuities, pensions, or other emoluments which might otherwise accrue to him from such service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

LANDS FOR PARK PURPOSES, DENVER, COLO.

The bill (S. 5197) granting public lands to the city and county of Denver, in the State of Colorado, for public-park purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Colorado Senators a question. I understand this land is near the city of Denver. If so, is it not worth more than a dollar and a quarter an acre?

Mr. THOMAS. No; it is not worth that for any other purposes than the purposes to which this bill proposes to dedicate it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it useless as agricultural land?

Mr. THOMAS. It is absolutely useless as agricultural land.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it is too far out from Denver to become useful as town lots?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes. It is designed as a municipal park for the city of Denver, but it is not adjacent to the city.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask if I heard correctly the reading of the bill to the effect that the city and county of Denver are authorized to sell these lands for any purpose they see fit?

Mr. THOMAS. No; the city can not sell the lands for any purpose. They must be used for park purposes, and they must be improved for park purposes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And for scenic purposes more than for anything else.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was, in section 1, page 1, after the enacting clause, to strike out "That there is hereby granted and conveyed" and to insert "That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell and convey," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell and convey to the city and county of Denver, a municipal corporation in the State of Colorado, for public park purposes, and for the use and benefit of said city and county, the following-described land, or so much thereof as said city and county may desire, to wit, etc.

SEC. 2. That the conveyance shall be made of the said lands to said city and county of Denver by the Secretary of the Interior upon payment by the said city and county for the said land, or such portions thereof as it may select, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, and patent issued to said city and county for the said land selected, to have and to hold for public park purposes, and that there shall be excepted from the grant hereby made any lands which at the date of the approval of this act shall be covered by a valid, existing, bona fide right or claim initiated under the laws of the United States: Provided, That this exception shall not continue to apply to any particular tract of land unless the claimant continues to comply with the law under which the claim or right was initiated: Provided, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in the land so granted and all necessary use of the land for extracting same: Provided further, That said city and county shall not have the right to sell or convey the land herein granted, or any part thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as before described, and that if the said lands shall be used for any purpose other than public park purposes, the same, or such parts thereof so used, shall revert to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 3, in the amendment reported by the committee, after the word "valid," it is proposed to strike out "adverse," so as to read, "subject to all prior valid rights."

ORGANIZATION OF THE REGULAR ARMY.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 146) to authorize the President to raise the organization of the Regular Army on certain occasions to its prescribed statutory maximum strength was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas in an act of Congress entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," approved February 2, 1901, and in an act entitled "An act to reorganize and to increase the efficiency of the Artillery of the United States Army," approved January 25, 1907, there were provided organizations for the Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, and Engineers of the United States Army; and

Whereas there was therein provided for such organizations of Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, and Engineers a minimum and maximum strength; and

Whereas it was therein provided that the President might, in his discretion, increase the aforesaid organizations from the prescribed minimum strength to a number not to exceed the prescribed maximum strength, under the restriction that in making this increase the total number of enlisted men authorized for the entire Army should not be exceeded; and

Whereas it was specifically provided in the act approved February 2, 1901, that "the total enlisted force of the line of the Army, together with such native force (Philippine Scouts), shall not exceed at any one time 100,000"; and

Whereas this restriction as to number prevents the raising of the organizations of Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, and Engineers to the prescribed statutory maximum strength (war strength) necessary to enable them to most efficiently and economically perform the duties required of them during war or other grave national emergency; and

Whereas at the present time there exists a condition which may at any moment require the fullest and most effective use to be made of the Regular Army of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That in time of war or when war is imminent, or on other occasions of grave national emergency requiring the use of the Regular Army of the United States, the President be authorized, in his discretion, to raise the organization of the Regular Army to the prescribed statutory maximum strength for the period of the war or until the imminence of war or other grave national emergency shall have passed, and that for this purpose the restriction of law limiting the total enlisted force of the line of the Army to 100,000 shall be suspended.

Mex., $1,106.98, on account of money paid by him August 1, 1885, to the Post Office Department, this being the amount embezzled by the assistant postmaster, W. E. Miller.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico at what time was the money referred to in the bill embezzled?

Mr. CATRON. About 10 or 12 years ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Before assistant postmasters were required to give bond?

Mr. CATRON. Yes; I think it was before assistant postmasters were required to give bond. That is the fact.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been looking for the report on this bill.

Mr. CATRON. There does not seem to be a report submitted to accompany the bill, but I can state the facts.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to suggest to the Senator that if the money was embezzled since assistant postmasters have been required to give bond, then I do not believe the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. CATRON. Well, it was before that time. I do not know how long before, but it was before that.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon the assurance of the Senator, I will not object; but I think there ought to be a report with the bill.

Mr. CATRON. I think it has been 15 years since Mr. Romero was postmaster at Las Vegas.

Thy blessing, O God our Father, attend us with wisdom, power, purity, and larger intent of purpose; that right may prevail, wrong diminish; that we may leave in our wake the way a little smoother for those who shall come after us. That brotherly love may have a wider sweep, contentions cease. So may we learn the joy of a good deed and receive instant rebuke for an evil thought or act, and thus pass on our way ennobled, purified, wise in our generation. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several conference reports were agreed to was laid on the table.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 8428) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to publicity of contributions and expenditures made for the purpose of influencing the nomination and election of candidates for the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States, limiting the amount of campaign expenses, and for other purposes.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. Suppose the amendment should be voted down. What would be the status of the bill then?

The SPEAKER. The bill would be exactly where it was before the motion to recommit.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken, as that particular paragraph was not discussed in the presence of the Members here——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. RUCKER. That is correct. I ask unanimous consent to discuss this section for five minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we will be glad to have the discussion, but we will want an equal time for discussion on the opposite side.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed five minutes, and that any gentleman on the other side may have an equal amount of time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] asks unanimous consent that, the rules to the contrary notwithstanding, he be allowed five minutes to discuss this matter from his standpoint, and that some Member who is opposed to his views have five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the vote on the motion to recommit having been carried, and the committee having reported to the House, and the House having voted upon the passage of the bill, and 146 having voted in favor of it and 11 against it, and then the point of no quorum having been made, and the House having adjourned, is it possible to go back and reconsider the vote by which the motion to recommit was carried?

The SPEAKER. The whole tale is that the Chair was mistaken about what ought to have been voted on. The unfinished business is this bill in respect to publicity of campaign contributions. It seemed to the Chair at first blush in the uproar prevailing here yesterday that it was an absolutely superfluous thing to vote on that amendment again; that the vote on recommitting was equivalent to adopting the amendment. But the Chair studied it out for himself when he had plenty of time last evening, and also conversed with a skillful parliamentarian, who is a Member of the House, upon the subject, and finally hunted up the authorities. This kind of a case might arise: The gentleman from California, instead of moving to recommit with 1 amendment, might have included 40 amendments in his motion, if he had so desired, and while the motion to recommit carries, the House might really on a separate vote vote some of those amendments in and some of them out. Then, as good luck would have it, the vote failed on account of the absence of a quorum, so that the incorrect ruling of the Chair did not make any difference. We lacked 15 or 20 Members of having a quorum. Fifteen or twenty Members come in this morning and make a quorum, so, as far as that is concerned, it might change the whole aspect of the affair.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, while I would not pretend for a moment to argue against the ruling of the Speaker at this time, the suggestion made by the Speaker that there might be three or four propositions in the motion to recommit, it seems to me, is not pertinent, for in this particular case there was but one.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but we can not establish a rule or a ruling for one particular case. We have to make it meet all cases. The Chair has no doubt whatever that the proper thing to vote upon when the time comes to vote in the first instance is the amendment reported by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. Then the bill will have to be engrossed and read a third time. That is the process.

Mr. RAKER. The bill does not have to be engrossed unless some one demands it.

The SPEAKER. Oh, yes. That is a matter of routine.

The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the gentleman from Missouri, and the Chair thinks under the circumstances of the case that it ought to be again reported.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask that the Clerk report the section as it will read if the amendment be adopted?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so done.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment, page 7, line 16, strike out in line 16 the words "in two or more States," so that the section as amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That every person, firm, association, or committee, except political committees as hereinbefore defined, that shall expend or promise any sum of money or other thing of value amounting to $50 or more for the purpose of influencing or controlling the result of an election at which Representatives or Senators to the Congress of the United States are elected, unless he or it shall contribute the same to a political committee as hereinbefore defined, shall file statements of the same under oath in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, at Washington, D. C., as required by sections 6 and 7 of this act, which statements shall be held by said Clerk in all respects as required by section 6 of this act."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. As I understood the motion to recommit, it provided that the committee should be directed to strike out of the bill the language "in two or more States," without specifying where the language was. Is that correct?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; it is on line 16, page 7. That was the motion, definitely stated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Forty-seven have risen. Those opposed will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Three have risen. Forty-seven is a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 134, nays 116, answered "present" 6, not voting 177, as follows:

Ending August 4:

Mr. WEAVER with Mr. SLOAN.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the Hall when my name was called. I was attending a session of the Judiciary Committee, inquiring into the charges against Judge Dayton. I would like to vote against this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not entitled to vote.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Illinois, I was attending a session of the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOWARD) there were 133 ayes and 19 noes.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. RUCKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. GARDNER. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 17041. An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he knows how many Senate amendments there are.

Mr. FITZGERALD. About 200.

Mr. MANN. I take it that if the bill goes over it will be printed showing the Senate amendments, and I therefore object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was endeavoring simply to expedite the business of the House.

Mr. MANN. The expedition ought not to come at the expense of Congress; the gentleman has been so neglectful in bringing in the bill that we ought not to expedite it now at the expense of the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not been neglectful in bringing in the bill; privileged business was interposed by a vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. Debate on this subject is out of order.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. UNDERWOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 12579. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 9: Page 7, line 18, strike out the word "remove."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to disagree to all of Senate amendments from No. 9 down to and including Senate amendment numbered 31; that is, to all amendments from No. 9 down to No. 31. No. 31 is the beginning of the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the House disagree to Senate amendments numbered 9 to 31, inclusive. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like for just a moment to attract the attention of the gentleman to amendments 9, 10, and 11, where I think the action of the Senate ought to be agreed to. I do not ask that be done now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I will change my request——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not change his request. We had some contest over this matter in the House and modified the language of the bill reported to the House, which carried the right to forcibly take an Indian away from his home and take him to a hospital.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will say to the gentleman I regard that as a very important amendment, and I will say to the committee that the committee which investigated the Indian matters in the West last fall had that matter under investigation with numerous doctors and numerous Indian agents and other persons connected with the Indian Service, and they seem to think it is necessary where an Indian had some contagious disease that the authorities ought to have the right to remove him to some hospital outside the reservation for the purpose of protecting the Indians on the reservation, and, if necessary, to remove them forcibly, and for that reason the House put this language in the bill. The Senate has stricken it out, and I think it ought to go to conference. I would not be willing to agree to the Senate amendment, because I believe in the interest of the Indians and in the interest of their health and in the interest of the country, to protect the country surrounding these Indian reservations, that they should be forced into a hospital, if the gentleman will yield, for they take our children and put them in a hospital, and why should they not take the Indian children who are affected with these contagious diseases?

Mr. MANN. With all due deference to the gentleman, I desire to submit the matter to the committee, and therefore I object until these amendments are disposed of.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, will the gentleman agree that the rest of the amendments from 11 to 31——

Mr. MANN. Wait until we dispose of this, and probably there will be no trouble about that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. All right, then, I will yield to the gentleman for the purpose of expressing his views on these amendments.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to consider amendments Nos. 9, 10, and 11 together.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think they should be considered together, because they relate to the same subject. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that they be considered together—amendments Nos. 9, 10, and 11—as they all refer to the same subject matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And that we disagree to amendments 9, 10, and 11.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's request is that we consider Senate amendments Nos. 9, 10, and 11 together.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet quite understood the gentleman's request.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that we consider Senate amendments numbered 9, 10, and 11 all at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that Senate amendments 9, 10, and 11 be considered at the same time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I had the first motion and my motion was to disagree, if the Chair pleases.

Mr. MANN. The motion I make takes precedence over the other and the effect is the same.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes a preferential motion to concur in Senate amendments numbered 9, 10, and 11.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like the attention of the committee for a moment. In dealing with Indians we perhaps have to deal in a little more cautious manner than we would in dealing with our own white people. Now, here is a provision which, as originally offered to the House, authorized without question the forcible taking of the Indian from his home to a hospital. There was some change made in the House when the bill was under consideration. The Senate has made it provide that the department may isolate or quarantine an Indian and use such means as may be necessary for that purpose. The language of the House bill was to use such force as may be necessary. Well, it may mean the same thing, but when we are dealing with the Indians and propose to advertise to them that we will use force to take them against their will from their homes to a hospital, I think we ought to be very cautious. They are naturally suspicious of the white doctors; they are naturally suspicious of the white people who seek to take them from their homes, and to authorize that this be done by force I think will have a very bad effect upon the Indians and fail to accomplish its purpose. The Senate amendment authorizes the quarantining or isolation of any Indian afflicted with contagious diseases, and such means as may be necessary to enforce that without putting into the law the provision that some doctor may employ the police as a matter of force to drag the Indian child out of its home and carry it to a hospital, where the Indian will believe that the purpose is to kill the child, and if it dies, as it may in many cases, the people will believe the whites killed the child.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: Does not the gentleman think the word "means" means the same as "force." We make it that they can employ such force as may be necessary in the isolation of these Indians. Now, they have stricken out the word "force" and inserted the word "means"——

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the meaning of the term "means"?

Mr. MANN. I think the term "means" would authorize the use of force; but it is just like asking a man in a polite manner to do something or to make an apology in a polite manner and hitting him in the face. That is the distinction.

One is an incentive to riot; the other is in a polite manner. Why should we not use politeness in dealing with the Indians? If it were proposed here that you could use force, we would not use the term "force" relating to ourselves, because that instantly excites opposition.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, there is undoubtedly much virtue in what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says; especially is there much merit in what he says about the difference in the use of these terms and the effect that they might have upon the Indian. So far as the terms are concerned, I think we will all agree that there is no difference at all as to what might be done under them. And I think, so far as the House Committee on Indian Affairs is concerned, its members might not be inclined to quibble over these changes or words. But the gentleman from Illinois knows we need have some freedom in conference. The gentleman knows that we will have to make some concessions to the Senate anyway, and I would prefer that he not take this opportunity away from us, which might be a good trading point when we get into conference.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. MANN. I should not have made the motion to concur at all except for the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] indicated his position to be that he favored the attitude of the department. The department has frequently stated that it wanted authority to send the police to the homes of the Indians and drag them out and take them to a hospital. I do not think they ought to have that authority; but that is their contention. That is the contention the gentleman from Texas has indicated he proposes to support in conference. That is the reason I made the motion.

Mr. CARTER. I think there must be some misunderstanding about this matter, because I know the gentleman from Texas never has assumed that attitude in the past. It has always been his attitude to deal with the Indians, and try to induce the department to deal with them, in the most moderate kind of terms, and I think perhaps the gentleman from Texas misunderstood exactly the thing the gentleman from Illinois was directing his conversation to when he made the remark. I hope the gentleman's motion will not prevail.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Does he think the power to isolate involves also the power to remove?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it involves the power to remove by force.

Mr. MILLER. Let me ask a further question.

Mr. MANN. I think it would involve the power to remove with consent or by such means as it might be necessary in order to isolate.

Mr. MILLER. Does he think the language which says they may employ such means involves permission to employ force as one of the means?

Mr. MANN. I think it would if it were necessary.

Mr. MILLER. I am very frank to say that personally, while I drew the exact language of this portion of the bill, I like the word "means" better than I do the word "force."

Mr. MANN. I think it is more polite.

Mr. MILLER. And I think the criticism advanced by the gentleman from Illinois is a very good one. I question very much, however, the striking out of the word "remove." It seems to me the power to isolate involves the power to remove.

Mr. MANN. I think that is true.

Mr. MILLER. And the power conferred by the language as amended is practically the same as the power originally conferred by the provision in the bill. But I do think the word "means" substituted for the word "force" is advisable. And yet, it seems to me the whole matter ought to go to conference. It is of the utmost importance that there reside in the Secretary of the Interior the power to remove or to isolate people who are afflicted with contagious and infectious diseases. Otherwise, there can not possibly be successful treatment of those cases.

I think the experience is quite general in dealing with sickness among the Indians that the full-bloods especially are disinclined to follow sanitary measures, disinclined to follow physicians' instructions, and much more apt to listen to their own medicine man, with his magic and incantation, the beating of kettledrums, and coloring the face and parts of the body with various kinds of coloring matter. And I believe that to be effective certain very marked power should reside in the Secretary of the Interior, although, of course, it should not be exercised one whit beyond the absolute necessities of the case, and should not be exercised in any case unless the public welfare, not simply the welfare of that one Indian, is concerned.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I noticed, according to the newspaper reports, that some very eminent physician stated—I think it was on yesterday—in addressing an audience more or less scientific, that 90 per cent, if they could be examined, would show that they had tuberculosis. Yet here is a provision which authorizes the Indian Office, if it decides that any Indian has tuberculosis, to drag him by force out of his home and take him to a hospital. Some of the doctors think that ought to be done. He would be worse off at the hospital than he would be at home under any sort of treatment.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. I wonder if the gentleman does not think there is a kind of a happy ground between the two, that instead of leaving the Indian in his tepee to eat mescal beans he had better be sent to the hospital by somebody? It is one of the certain things that some of them will stick to their medicine men, who will give them peyote and mescal beans and will not want to use the hospitals and the ordinary medicines. This is not "How do you do, Mr. Indian," and "Good morning," but it is to say what is best not only to the individual Indian but to those who remain.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a proposition was made here to drag a Christian Scientist out of her or his home because some doctor thought it ought to be done, do you think it would pass? Suppose a proposition were made here to drag some believer in homeopathy out of her or his home because some doctor thought it ought to be done, do you think it would pass?

Now, here is a proposition to treat the Indians on quite a different basis from that on which we treat ourselves. I am willing to give the authority desired, but I think it ought at least to be couched in courteous language. You could not put either one of the propositions through this House if they were to relate to white people. You could not get 25 Members to vote for either one of them in that case.

Mr. FERRIS. It is a little bit of difference between dealing with Indians, in some cases not civilized, and white people.

Mr. MANN. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], who will be one of the conferees, I will withdraw my motion to concur, or ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion to concur. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I ask that amendments from 9 to 31, inclusive, be disagreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have just acted on No. 9. Why not make it begin with No. 12?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I modify my request, and ask that amendments from 11 to 31, inclusive, be disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that amendments 11 to 31, inclusive, be disagreed to. Is there objection?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman where that amendment is that refers to the use of certain lands for irrigation purposes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think that comes under the head of the States. I think it comes under Montana or Arizona—somewhere out in that western country.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. If it is not, I would be glad to agree to the gentleman's request, but as to that particular amendment I want to say something.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am sure it is under the head of the States, either Arizona or Montana.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have consideration given this morning to amendment No. 13. That is the amendment whereby the House attempted to oust from the service many meritorious school-teachers connected with the Indian Service. The Senate has disagreed to the House amendment. We contested it in the House, and it was adopted only by a very small majority. I think it is an outrageous provision to oust from the public service these most meritorious school-teachers connected with the Indian Service and subject them to a rigid civil-service examination, or something in the guise of a civil-service examination, after they have given years and years to the teaching of these Indian wards. Unless we can have a separate vote on that provision I shall object.

Mr. GORDON. How does the gentleman know these teachers are so well qualified?

Mr. STAFFORD. I know it because they would not have been continued in the public service these many years unless they were qualified.

Mr. GORDON. Is that the only proof the gentleman has?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have such confidence in the administration of the Indian Bureau, whether Republican or Democratic, that I believe the teachers in connection with the instruction of our Indian wards are qualified; otherwise they would not be continued in the service.

Mr. GORDON. Has the gentleman any knowledge of these teachers personally?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not any personal knowledge of them, but I have faith in the administration of the Indian Bureau.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman has more faith than I have.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have faith in the present administration—more than the gentleman has. If these teachers are not competent, they should be removed; but they should not be ousted under the cloak of the civil-service examination after years of employment. Will you trust the Indian Commissioner? I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in view of the gentleman's statement, I will modify my request and wish to except No. 13 from the agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas requests that the House disagree to amendments 11 to 31, inclusive, except No. 13.

Mr. MANN. How about 9, 10, and 11?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They have been disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand the gentleman from Illinois withdrew his motion to concur. That takes care of itself.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] then moved to disagree to the amendments, and that motion was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman excepted from that motion amendments numbered 9 and 10.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Amendments 9, 10, and 11.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Were amendments numbered 9 and 10 included?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. MANN. I knew they had not been.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in order to expedite business and put it beyond question, I ask that my request be modified. I ask that amendments from 9 to 31, inclusive, be disagreed to, except No. 13.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. After the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] withdrew the motion to concur in amendments numbered 9, 10, and 11 the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] repeated his motion to disagree to those amendments, and, as I understood it, the Chair put the motion, and the motion was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that the disagreement be upon amendments 11 to 31, inclusive.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I now amend it so as to make it amendments numbered 9 to 31, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the gentleman from Texas asks to disagree to Senate amendments numbered 9 to 31, inclusive, with the exception of No. 13.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will ask the distinguished Chairman that, if he agrees to the Senate amendment numbered 27, he will see that the conferees from the Senate correct the spelling of some of the words on page 14, line 11.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that that is one of the objects of the conference—to correct all the errors of that character—and it certainly will be done. I move, Mr. Chairman, that amendments 9 to 31, excepting No. 13, be disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes have it, and the amendments named are disagreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I now move, Mr. Chairman, that we disagree to amendment No. 13, after it is reported by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee disagree to Senate amendment No. 13. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to concur in Senate amendment numbered 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] makes a preferential motion to concur in Senate amendment numbered 13.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARTER. Has the amendment yet been reported to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask that it be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 13: Page 8, lines 5 to 10, strike out the following language: "Shall be paid any employee in any position in the Indian school service who does not hold a certificate showing that such employee has passed the necessary examination required by the Civil Service Commission for such position, except such employees as are exempt under civil-service rules, and no part of it."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if I can obtain an agreement with the gentleman for a vote upon this amendment separately, I have no desire to press my amendment. Of course, if the conferees agree to the Senate amendment striking the language out of the bill, that will meet with my entire approval; but if we are not going to have an opportunity to vote upon this separately, then I desire to test the sense of the committee here now and have it submitted to a vote.

Mr. CARTER. Would the gentleman be satisfied to have it voted on right now and disposed of, and let this end it?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am willing to let it go to conference, with the understanding that this amendment shall come back for a separate vote, or else to have the discussion now.

Mr. CARTER. I mean, is the gentleman willing to take a vote now and let that end it?

Mr. STAFFORD. As far as I am concerned, I am willing, but I think we ought to have a larger attendance here. This is a very important matter.

Mr. CARTER. Of course I could not make that agreement, because that would be an attempt on my part to bind some one else.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is perfectly within the gentleman's power to have a separate vote on this.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman means a separate vote after we get into conference?

Mr. STAFFORD. After the bill is sent to conference, and when it comes back, before a final agreement is reached.

Mr. COX. Before the report is finally agreed upon.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before a final report is agreed upon.

Mr. FERRIS. What objection has the gentleman to having every employee of the Government come up and show that he is qualified? The Indian schools and service have to be paid for by the Government. What is there that appeals to the gentleman outside of the one question of keeping the Indian school force at all times efficient?

Mr. STAFFORD. This will compel the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to remove every school-teacher who has not at the present time passed a civil-service examination. This does not say that they will be given an opportunity to pass an examination. They may be meritorious teachers, and yet the phraseology of this amendment is such that it would force the head of the Indian Service to remove them if they have not at some time passed a civil-service examination.

Mr. FERRIS. Let us read it and see if it goes that far.

Mr. STAFFORD. It says:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation, or any other appropriation provided for herein, except appropriations made pursuant to treaties, shall be paid any employee in any position in the Indian school service who does not hold a certificate showing that such employee has passed the necessary examination required by the Civil Service Commission for such position, except such employees as are exempt under civil-service rules.

There is more in this than you would think at first glance. This is a studied effort on the part of some person to remove efficient, competent school-teachers who have been identified with the Indian school service for years and years. I am not in favor of that policy. This does not say that they must subject themselves to a civil-service examination and prove their qualifications.

Mr. FERRIS. I confess I am not very familiar with it; but in any event it would seem best to send it to conference with the other 167 amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. Chairman, I wish the serious attention of the committee to this item. We have this condition before us: We have teachers who have been identified with the Indian school service for years and years, who are competent as well as experienced. Now, what does this propose to do?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like a little more time. My time was taken up with questions.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for five minutes. None of us want to be mistaken about this. I was not here when it passed. It has not heretofore been called to my attention.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Wisconsin be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. These school-teachers came into the service when a civil-service examination was not required. They are competent. At least it is to be presumed they are competent. We should give them the benefit of that presumption in considering this question. After they have performed this work for years and years you propose that in case they have not a civil-service certificate they are to be ousted from the service. That is what this phraseology means. It does not say that all school-teachers must take a civil-service examination, and if they fail to qualify they shall be removed. I wish to put this question to the gentleman from Oklahoma. I know he is deeply concerned in the welfare of these Indians, and I wish to ask him whether the head of the Indian Bureau to-day has not authority to remove any incompetent school-teacher who is now in the service?

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman want an answer to that?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

Mr. FERRIS. I presume he has, unless they are covered into the civil service. A good many of them, if not all of them, are already in the civil service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Evidently they are not, or else this provision is meaningless.

Mr. FERRIS. Not all of them have been, but I think most of them have been. So this would not affect them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have school-teachers who are efficient and experienced who have not passed a civil-service examination, and you are saying by this provision "get out of the service unless you have a civil-service certificate." I am opposed to that. I do not think it is fair treatment of these teachers who have done so much toward the uplift and the education of our Indian wards. If it merely provided that they should first take a civil-service examination, and if they failed to qualify, then they should be removed; that would be a different question; but that is not this provision, and even then I can not see the occasion for it. I can not see any reason why we should place such a requirement upon these school-teachers who have given so many, many years to the service of the Government and subject them now to a civil-service examination.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. COX. Does the law of Wisconsin require teachers in the public schools to attend a normal institute for a certain length of time?

Mr. STAFFORD. We have various kinds of certificates—class A, class B, and class C. Class A is a certificate given only when they have gone through a normal school, but I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this provision does not relate to those who come into the service hereafter. It is to remove trustworthy, tried, and efficient school-teachers.

Mr. COX. I am not so sure but that they ought to be removed.

Mr. STAFFORD. This provision says if they have not civil-service certificates they shall be removed.

Mr. CONRY. What particular teachers are comprehended within this provision?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know what is the aim of the gentlemen of the committee in trying to pass this provision. This was under consideration in the House, and I opposed it then as not being fair to those who had given years and years of faithful service to the teaching of the wards of the Government.

Mr. CONRY. Would this eliminate from the service as teachers down there people who, by experience, have demonstrated their ability as teachers?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the purpose of it. If they do not happen to have civil-service certificates, they are to be removed.

Mr. CONRY. Where is the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no necessity for it. It is a cloak for something. I can not see the reason for it.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the committee, and I do not know what the origin of this amendment is. I do not know that it has any hidden purpose which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] thinks it has. If it has, I would not for one moment be for it. If it would disturb anything or anybody, I would not be for it; but I can not see, for the life of me, why any gentleman would object to letting the employees in the Indian Service subject themselves to an ordinary examination, which would determine whether or not they were, in fact, qualified.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will ask the gentleman to let me proceed for a moment. For instance, all teachers in all of the white schools everywhere, North, South, East, and West, have to demonstrate their qualifications, and it seems to me it would be only right, inasmuch as the Federal Government is to pay the bill, to let each and every employee undergo such examination as would demonstrate his qualifications. Some one intimated here that it had some hidden purpose. I do not see where it is. I think a school-teacher who teaches Indians does not necessarily have to have a rigid literary examination; but, so far as all branches are concerned, it seems to me that they certainly ought to determine their ability from a common sense standpoint, and from an educational standpoint, to really accomplish something among the Indians. I have no doubt, as has been stated by my good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], that some of the teachers who have accomplished most could not pass the highest grade in a literary examination. I think that is true in this work as in others; but I submit, the Civil Service Commission makes up the rules and regulations, and they do not have to make them so rigid that they can not be passed. They ought to make them practical and sensible.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated that the argument is that this provision seeks to remove efficient teachers who have not, perchance, taken the civil-service examination. My position is confirmed by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. FERRIS. What is his position? I have great confidence in him. This amendment is to strike out a provision the House has once passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. That the effect of this provision is to remove them immediately, provided they have not taken the civil-service examination. That is the reading of it. You can not read anything else into it. It does not give those who have proven their worth any way of retaining their position. I call for some explanation of the purpose of this amendment. There is only one reading of it, and that is what I have just stated.

Mr. FERRIS. O Mr. Chairman, I do not want to yield to the gentleman for another speech. He has already spoken 10 minutes and I have not said anything at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I give the gentleman credit for saying something in the two minutes that he has already occupied.

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. CONRY. Is it not true that under the language which has been stricken out by this proposed amendment the people who will be dropped under the operation of the law have not had an opportunity to pass this examination, and consequently do not possess certificates, and if this law is to apply to them they will be dropped immediately?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think so. If I thought so, I would agree with the gentleman. I think most of them are already in the service and this would not apply.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. FERRIS. My idea is that it does this: That the teachers and employees in the school who are not in the civil service will make application to the Civil Service Commission and pass such examination as ought to be passed by them. Surely it will not knock out efficient teachers.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have expressed no opinion one way or the other upon this amendment, but unquestionably this amendment would eliminate from the service a person who was in the service who might be efficient, if he did not possess his certificate.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not agree to that. If that is true it may be a mistake.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They could not get back except by taking an examination and taking their chances on the eligible list, and they might never get back.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true. The last statement of the gentleman is undoubtedly true.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Let me reply first to the gentleman from South Dakota. I am not a member of the committee, and I do not know all about this. I may be wrong, but my thought is that such teachers and employees as can not come in and show themselves properly qualified, it seems to me, ought not to be carried on the rolls and the Government ought not to pay for their services. I do not know who this hits or if it hits anybody, but any teacher who can not show himself worthy of his hire, so long as the Federal Government pays the bill, it seems to me ought to quit. I do not know that there are any, I do not know that any will lose out on this, but what harm will it do for them to come in and show that they are competent? I now yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman will agree to this, that teachers who are hereafter to be employed ought to be required to take a civil-service examination and show that they are efficient. Does not the gentleman so think? The gentleman will agree with me a little further, that where there has been service, meritorious work and meritorious acts, under the Government, surely no one wants to knock them out. For instance, under the Civil Service Commission a certain number of percentages is allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more until I can hear the question of the gentleman from Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOVAN. It is true that in the service old soldiers receive exemption on account of meritorious services, and in different branches of the Government there is an allowance for meritorious work. Now, if there has been meritorious work in the opinion of the Indian Commissioner, does not the gentleman think that they ought to have an allowance when you require a new teacher?

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman from Connecticut is entirely right, and I have no doubt that under the regulations that would come in.

Mr. DONOVAN. Would it not be proper for us to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, for that would only affect those who had been in the service?

Mr. FERRIS. No; I would not be in favor of that. I think we had better let it go to conference and let the conferees work it out. They will have more time to adjust it properly.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman will admit that for meritorious work there ought to be consideration and not humiliation?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, yes. The gentleman and I are in hearty accord on this, as in many other matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, to concur in this amendment would simply follow out the policy that the Government has pursued with respect to the employees in the civil service ever since the civil-service law has been enacted. A person who rendered meritorious services in any department of the Government, who went in without examination or as a political appointee during a Republican administration or during a Democratic administration, if such person rendered good service was subsequently covered into the civil service, with tenure of office protected by Executive order.

Now, many of these teachers may have been covered into the service by Executive order. No doubt they have been covered in because of meritorious work, because of good services rendered; but if the Senate amendment is not agreed to they would have to take an examination, and even then they could not get in.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would be advisable to let this go to conference, so that the language may be perfected and obviate the troubles that have been suggested?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin ought to be agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. For instance, it says that no money shall be paid any employee in any position in the Indian school service who does not hold a certificate showing that such employee has passed the necessary examination required by the Civil Service Commision for such position.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The fact is that many of these teachers, like teachers in the public schools, have been in the service a long time and are thoroughly efficient, are acquainted with those whom they have to teach, and know what is required in the proper performance of their duties. I would rather have long service well rendered as a recommendation than a certificate from the Civil Service Commission. That sort of a teacher undoubtedly would give better service to the Government, just as such a teacher would give better service to a school in a local community or in a private school. I see no reason why we should make any changes, and I think we should agree with the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will notice the peculiar wording of this amendment. It says:

Shall not be paid to any employee in any position in the Indian school service.

I do not know in Oklahoma any teacher, whether in the prairie tribes on the west side of the State or the Five Tribes, but what has passed an examination under the civil service, but there are certain employees connected with the schools that have not passed the examination, and this amendment really "gets" them and not the school-teacher. So far as the civil service is concerned with reference to school-teachers, I do not think that the present civil-service law as applied to everything is wise as far as the teachers are concerned, for the reason that the greatest element of a qualified Indian teacher is to know the Indian nature and have a sympathetic helpfulness for him.

Four or five years ago I remember when the head of the school at Chilocco was put on the program at the Indian Rights Association at Lake Mohonk, N. Y. He had been at the head of that school for a number of years, and his entire address was a tirade on the Indian; so much so that every speaker on the program thereafter criticized it. The Civil Service Commission knows no more about the kind of a man that ought to teach the Indians than does a Hottentot in Africa. But the rules as to employees are wise.

While on that question I want to say that I think the civil service as governing the Indians should be a distinct service, and the law ought therefore to be amended. I do not think this amendment affects a single school-teacher, and if so, only a few of them, but it does affect the employees.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to call attention to the fact that there are in the service a large number of bonded superintendents in charge of Indian agencies who went into the service without any civil-service examination, and by Executive order were subsequently covered into the service.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I think that is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, under this language, could there be any money paid to them unless they held a certificate that they had passed the necessary examination required by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. No. But now let me say that these bonded superintendents to whom the gentleman refers must have more information than an educator.

He has to have some knowledge of agriculture, because he has those things in connection with the school to manage, and he has got to be a good business man. He has got to have a knowledge of education and educational affairs of the institution, but usually they do not do any teaching. He is the executive head of the institution, and, of course, in these particular fields the examinations are covered under the civil-service law; and I have had recent occasion to investigate them covering these particular things. The bonded officer referred to is appointed, for the most part, because of his political pull at the time he is appointed. There are some of them good and some bad; but the man I referred to a while ago as superintendent of the Chilocco School went in without civil-service examination and ought to have been dismissed because of lack of sympathy for the people he was trying to serve. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONRY. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that the term "employee" in the words "in any position in the Indian school service" does not include school-teachers?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. It will include school-teachers, but I do not know of any school-teacher who has stood the examination but would have to stand the examination over; and if they could not pass the examination, they could not get through.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Suppose they did take the examination, would not they have to take their chances of being appointed from the eligible list?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And unless they apply within one year after they went on the list they would have to take the examination over again?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That is true; but I will state that most of the States of the Union require examinations year after year unless the teacher shows an extraordinary degree of proficiency. For instance, when I was a teacher in Texas, we had a one-year, two-year, three-year, and a four-year certificate and a life certificate. To get a life certificate required about a 95 per cent grade and about 80 per cent on everything, whereas the man who fell as low as 60 might teach one or two years, according to his general grade. I think a great many of these people in the Indian Service ought to be compelled to take the examination just as teachers in the States, so as to keep them up, otherwise they will not be up with the times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota, who has raised the objection——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Minnesota, who was seeking recognition.

Mr. MILLER. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas if he has some request to make. Mr. Chairman, I was opposed to this language stricken out by the Senate amendment when it was here before the House, and I am opposed to the language now; therefore I am in favor of concurring in the Senate amendment to strike it out. I think the membership of the committee ought to be clear in their minds as to the exact effect of this language. It does eliminate from the service. It would not be here if its object was not to eliminate from the service. Now, let us see exactly how it does it. It says that no money appropriated by this bill shall be paid to any school-teacher or employee in the Indian school service unless such person has a civil-service certificate.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It does not say any "school-teacher."

Mr. MILLER. But the language is such as to include school-teachers. In other words, any person now in the school service who has not a certificate would not be able to draw a bit of salary. That eliminates them. Now, what would they do? The only thing they could do would be to quit the service or submit themselves to a civil-service examination. When? Nobody knows when. There is no examination in the immediate future contemplated by the commission to secure additional teachers or employees in the Indian Service. There might not be such an examination held for years. But if one should be held within a reasonable time in the future and these employees presented themselves possibly they would pass, and pass high. They then, however, would have to wait their regular turn to secure employment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Let me complete this statement and then I will yield. But that does not yet state one-half the case. Most of these employees have been in the Indian Service for a great many years. They have been efficient or they would not have been retained. There is an age limit, and any applicant who is over that age is unable to take acivil-service examination. I venture to say that 90 per cent of the people eliminated by this language are now over the age limit, and if they presented themselves for an examination they would be refused permission to take it. So absolutely this does eliminate, and it eliminates now and perpetually. Now, let us see whom it affects. It does eliminate school-teachers. Every member of the Committee on Indian Affairs in this House knows, or I am sure he will know if he will stop for a few moments to think, that there are good, trained, and efficient school-teachers in the Indian Service who have never passed a civil-service examination. It will also eliminate a great many superintendents and Indian agents in the United States, men who are drawing their salaries from the school fund.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman certainly overlooked the last part of this amendment, which says, "except such employees as are exempt under civil-service rules." Those who are not exempt must take this examination.

Mr. MILLER. But none will be exempt, I assure the gentleman from Texas; and I am sure he will agree with me, on reflection, that none of them are exempt and that all will be required to hold certificates from the Civil Service Commission before they can draw any salary. That eliminates them from the service.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman heard the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] cite school superintendents as being exempt because they were employees——

Mr. MILLER. Bonded superintendents; that may be.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That exemption will apply.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, but the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], I am sure, must be aware of the fact that a large number of superintendents throughout the United States are drawing at least a part of their annual salary from the school fund, because their work is dual, being both executive and educational. Under the general law they are not exempt from the civil service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire just simply to make a statement. Some gentlemen have insinuated that there is some sinister motive behind this, and I can not understand it. These hearings were all in the open, and they are all in print and accessible to every man in the House. This matter was brought about in this way: While in the West last summer we found a great many reservations that had matrons, and they had certain duties to perform. We found also discussion going on in the newspapers throughout the country relative to the health and condition of the Indians; that it was a fast-decaying and dying race on account of tuberculosis, and for that reason it was necessary to have trained nurses, and it was necessary to have these matrons trained nurses instead of as they now are, and under the rules they are not required to stand any examinations. The physicians in charge of these Indians and reservations and schools stated it would be a very great advantage to them in their practice if they had trained nurses. And that is the reason why this language was written into this bill. It was never intended to strike anybody from the school service who were permitted to teach or hold any other position, if they were properly qualified.

I see no reason why anyone should object to this language. It is very plain that no amount shall be paid to any employee in any position in the Indian school service who does not hold a certificate. Such an employee will have passed the necessary examination required by the Civil Service Commission for such position. That is only a declaration of the law that the money shall not be paid to anyone unless authorized to receive it, and the exception is as to employees who are exempt under the civil-service rules. Now, if teachers, or anyone else under the civil service, are required, as they are required, to stand these civil-service examinations, that is all this law does. It is only declaratory of what the law now is.

Mr. FERRIS. Some Members here are of the opinion that it is really more than you want to do or other gentlemen would want to do. Could not this be rewritten so that it would not displace any teacher, and not so much on the ground of a rigid educational qualification as from the standpoint of accomplishment, so that the commissioner could select them, not so much because of a literary test as one of actual accomplishment? I know that at a great many of these schools, from my own personal observation, they have an agricultural school in connection with the main school, and we find that some of the best teachers, those who really accomplish the most, are ones who could not pass a rigid literary examination. Can not that be written so that you weed out those who are not accomplishing anything and sustain those who are accomplishing something?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think it could, if this could be submitted to a conference.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Who suggested the change here?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Government department.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The head of the department?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The bill was written in the department.

Mr. ANSBERRY. And that language was in the bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As I understand it.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I have asked everybody on the committee, so far as I have been able, and I can not find out.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If you will look back on page 7, beginning with line 8, you will find a similar provision that the gentleman has said nothing about. It is this:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, employ physicians regularly licensed to practice to aid in carrying out the provisions of this paragraph without requiring such employed physicians to pass any civil-service examination.

That matter has been disagreed to and is in conference already. Now, why not have this provision go with it to the same extent?

Mr. ANSBERRY. You have said you think that is the case. Do you not know who put that language in?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state this, as I said before, that the physician and the head——

Mr. ANSBERRY. Not that. I am referring to the teachers.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is nothing said about schools, and it was put in here for the purpose of having matrons qualified to give medicine under the instructions and directions of the physicians.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I think I can furnish the gentleman from Ohio the information he desires. I did not have it when he asked me a few moments ago.

Mr. ANSBERRY. What do you say as to whether this applies to school-teachers or not?

Mr. CARTER. I think it applies to school-teachers.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The chairman of the committee has just gotten through saying that it did not.

Mr. CARTER. Let us read back and see.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the chairman just got through stating it did not apply to the schools.

Mr. CARTER. I think the gentleman must have misunderstood you.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The language is very plain, if the gentleman will permit me to read it again. It says:

Shall be paid any employee in any position in the Indian School service who does not hold a certificate showing that such employee has passed the necessary examination required by the Civil Service Commission for such position, except such employees as are exempt under the civil-service rules.

Mr. ANSBERRY. From where are you reading?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am reading from the language stricken out.

Mr. ANSBERRY. On page 8?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. On page 8. It is only declaratory of what the law is to-day. The law requires a civil-service examination, and that is all we require to be done. Now, does the gentleman desire to pay any money out of the United States Treasury to persons who are teaching school or doing anything else, contrary to the laws of the country?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Oh, well now, nobody proposes to violate the law——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is what this does——

Mr. ANSBERRY. Or anything of the sort.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the civil-service law, for instance, the President has the power to except positions from the classified service. A person might be appointed under such an order. This provision would prevent that person from receiving compensation, would it not?

Mr. CARTER. I think, if the gentleman from New York will listen to me a moment, he will find that this last exception perhaps will prevent that—"except such employees as are exempt under civil-service rules."

Mr. ANSBERRY. That would apply to soldiers, as I understand it?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Just a moment——

Mr. CARTER. Just as soon as I can answer the imperturbable Irishman from Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. Let the gentleman go ahead. He is going to explain, is he not?

Mr. CARTER. I was just informed by the clerk to the Committee on Indian Affairs that this language was placed in the bill at the suggestion of the doctor who is in charge of the health service in the Indian Bureau.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; Dr. J. L. Murphy. It is in the hearings.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman knows that I lean heavily on him with respect to information concerning Indians. I will ask the gentleman what is behind this provision?

Mr. CARTER. I have told the gentleman all I know about it.

Mr. BUTLER. But the gentleman is on the committee. Why did you write this provision in?

Mr. CARTER. It was placed there at the suggestion of the doctor.

Mr. BUTLER. I mean with relation to the school-teachers. I do not want to lose my confidence in my friend. Let him tell us why it was put in.

Mr. CARTER. I do not remember just what happened in regard to this, but I am informed, as I say, by the clerk to the Committee on Indian Affairs that it was placed in the bill at the suggestion of the doctor who represents——

Mr. BUTLER. What kind of a doctor—a horse doctor, a dentist, a medical doctor, or a doctor of philosophy?

Mr. CARTER. A medical doctor.

Mr. BUTLER. What has he got to do with school-teaching?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota rose.

Mr. CARTER. Perhaps the gentleman from South Dakota will remember more than I do about it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I was not here, Mr. Chairman, at the time it was put in; but I want to say that if it had been put in at the suggestion of Dr. Murphy it would be under the paragraph for relief of distress or prevention and treatment of tuberculosis. Now, I think it was in the first draft of the bill, prepared in the Indian Office and sent to the committee, without appearing to change the existing law.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman may be correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARTER. I was speaking from what the clerk to the committee told me. I think it is perfectly safe to send it to conference.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman from Oklahoma had finished his statement.

Mr. CARTER. No; I was not through.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was still standing up, though not talking, but adding, nevertheless, just as much to the sum of human knowledge. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that I think it is perfectly safe to send this to conference along with the other amendments. I do not see any reason why this amendment should not be singled out and concurred in here. As I often stated before, we must retain all we can muster to trade upon.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I do think you ought to trade upon the parentage of this very doubtful proposition. I think you ought to establish its parentage before you go into conference.

Mr. CARTER. I am perfectly willing that you should do that, but you can not establish it through me, more than from what I have told the gentleman, and I have told him where I got my information.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, let us have no misunderstanding as to the effect of this amendment. The design and the effect of the amendment is to send out of the Indian school service certain teachers who are now in that service. The amendment is very skillfully drawn by some one—I do not know who—and we have not been able to ascertain who originated this language.

It provides that no money can be paid to any employee in the Indian school service who does not hold a certificate showing that such employee has passed the necessary examination required by the Civil Service Commission for such position. The moment this bill becomes a law these people have to go out of the service, because they can not remain in the service for the reason that there is no money appropriated which can be paid to them.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. MANN. They will be out of the service. Now, the bill purports to provide that they shall have the right to obtain a certificate from a civil-service examination, but they can not obtain such a certificate unless they file a new application for appointment as teacher, and if they are over age they can not file an application. There is no authority to the Civil Service Commission to give a special examination to these people to see whether they can pass the civil-service examination, nor does the Civil Service Commission ever issue a certificate that somebody has passed an examination; and the effect——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit, I will say this, that even if they do take the examination they would go on the eligible list and might never be reached.

Mr. MANN. Yes. If they file an application and take the examination this year or next year, they would go on the eligible list, and must be appointed from the three highest on the eligible list, and appointed within one year; so that while the amendment would indicate on its face that these people would be given a chance, "a show for their white alleys," as the boys say, yet it absolutely puts them out of the service without a hearing, without a trial, and without consideration by the department; and the department now has the authority to dismiss any one of them, or all of them, or such of them as the department desires to dismiss.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But suppose that the department does not live up to these civil-service rules? It is required to do so now.

Mr. MANN. There is no requirement now that these people shall pass a civil-service examination. If there were, this provision would not be in the bill. The purpose of this is to change existing requirements and put in a new requirement, which does not now exist.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman believe that they ought to be qualified, either under the civil-service laws of the United States or of the States?

Mr. MANN. I believe they ought to be qualified teachers.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Who is to be the judge?

Mr. MANN. The department is the judge now. If there are any of those teachers that are not qualified, the department can dismiss them to-day or to-morrow. The department now has that authority. Everyone who passes a civil-service examination and is appointed does not thereby show qualification, and the department frequently dismisses people from the service, and properly, who have been examined and appointed under the civil-service rules. The department has as great authority now as it would have if this provision were enacted; but the gentleman's proposition is to cut them off without a chance of a hearing and prevent their reappointment. I do not think it ought to be done.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the words "hereafter employed" should be inserted after the words "any employee," that would not take effect until July 1, 1915, and that would give them 11 months.

Mr. MANN. It would be effective when the bill became a law. "Hereafter" would mean the moment this bill is signed by the President and becomes a law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It would be an easy matter to amend it, because the provision will be in conference.

Mr. MANN. It will not be an easy matter to amend it after it has become a law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This bill has never been in conference.

Mr. MANN. No; this bill has never been in conference, and we who are opposed to the provision know perfectly well that if it goes to conference that it will remain in the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How does the gentleman know what six men will do when he does not even know at the present time who those men will be?

Mr. MANN. But I do know who the men will be.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, as I said yesterday, the gentleman certainly has supernatural powers.

Mr. MANN. No; but I can tell the gentleman who the House conferees will be. The conferees on the part of the House will be the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]. If my friend from Texas does not know that much, I do know it, and I leave it to future events to show whether I guess right or not. It does not require any supernatural power.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to concur to the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEPHENS of Texas) there were—ayes 50, noes 9.

Accordingly the motion of Mr. STAFFORD to concur to the Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask for the reading of amendment 31.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that amendment 31 has been disagreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, the next amendment is No. 32, under the head of "Arizona and New Mexico."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 32: On page 17 of the bill, after line 23, insert the following:

"To enable the Secretary of the Interior to provide school facilities for the children of the Papago Tribe of Indians in Arizona, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, this amount to be in addition to any other funds available for that purpose."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will there be any objection to disagreeing to all of the amendments and items under the various States where the amounts have been increased? I have a list of them here. Most of them are with reference to schools.

Mr. MILLER. That means that most of the items are additions and would come under the head of increases. For instance, No. 32 is really a new item.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I refer to those that are increases.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he move to disagree to this amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I move to disagree to amendment No. 32.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I move that we disagree also to amendment No. 33.

Mr. MANN. Let the amendment be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 33: Page 18, lines 17 to 20, inclusive, strike out the following: "reimbursable to the United States by the Indians having tribal rights on said reservation and to remain a charge and lien upon the lands and funds belonging to said Indians until paid."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to concur in the Senate amendment. I do this only for the purpose of getting it before the committee. I will withdraw the motion if the gentleman will make a motion which will get the matter before the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I move to disagree to amendment 33.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in Arizona and New Mexico, particularly in Arizona, there seem to be a number of places where they desire to have bridges built across rivers for the benefit of the Indian tribes there. They say that it is necessary for the Indians to have these bridges built. The Indians own vast areas of land, and if the bridges are to be built, it seems to me there is no reason why the cost should finally be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. On the contrary, the cost should be charged, eventually at least, to the Indians themselves, who are quite able to pay the bills when their land is disposed of.

This is for the construction of a bridge across the Moencopi Wash, on the western Navajo Indian Reservation, Ariz. This came before the House after several other propositions of a similar character had been passed, and it was provided that the money so advanced should be reimbursable.

The Senate has stricken that out. I suppose at the instance of one of the distinguished Senators from Arizona. Not only have they stricken out that reimbursable item as to this bridge, but they have inserted as another amendment to this bill a provision repealing an item that we put in the bill last year for a bridge, making it reimbursable from the Indian fund. Not only have they done that, but they have stricken out of this bill a provision for an investigation as to the necessity of a bridge across the Colorado River, which would probably have carried a reimbursable provision, and they have inserted an amendment that that bridge be built and paid for out of the General Treasury and not be reimbursable, and have even provided that the bridge shall be built under the general bridge act, which of course is as foolish a thing as could be done, because there is no navigation there, and the War Department has no control over it and knows nothing about it, and ought to know nothing about it.

Now, if I may learn it, I should like to know the attitude of my distinguished friend from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and of the distinguished gentlemen who will be on the conference committee, as to whether they are willing to stand by the attitude of the House and keep the agreements which were made when this provision went into the bill in the first place, or whether it has become their policy to let the Government build these bridges for the benefit of Indians who are able to pay for them, without requiring the reimbursement of the General Treasury?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman desires to know my personal views, I think the House provision was correct, and that the Senate committed an error when they struck it out and made it not reimbursable. Now, it may be that in the future there may be a vast sum of money arising from the sale of land, timber, and so forth, that will go into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. It is certain that there will be a vast sum of money going to somebody out of these lands, because the lands are worth it, and are becoming more valuable every year as time goes on.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is correct, and I assure him for that reason that if I am on the conference committee I shall insist on standing on the House provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the House disagree to Senate amendment No. 33.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to set aside and reserve as a school farm for the Fort Yuma Indian School the west half of the northwest quarter and the west half of the southwest quarter of section 24, township 16 south, range 22 east, San Bernardino meridian.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, amendments 35 to 40, inclusive, carry largely the same question that was involved in amendment 33, which the gentleman has spoken of. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to disagree to all these amendments.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to amendments 34 to 39, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to disagree to Senate amendments 34 to 39, inclusive.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"There is hereby appropriated the sum of $50,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to use this money, or so much thereof as may be necessary, under such regulations as he may prescribe, for the promotion of civilization and self-support among the Indians residing and having tribal rights on the Colorado River and Yuma Reservations, the said sum to be expended in the purchase of seed, live stock, vehicles, harness, machinery, tools, implements, and other agricultural equipment; and for such other purposes as the Secretary of the Interior may deem proper in promoting their civilization and self-support: Provided, That said sum shall be expended under conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for its repayment to the United States on or before June 30, 1925, and all repayments to this fund made on or before June 30, 1924, are hereby reappropriated for the same purpose as the original fund, and the entire fund, including such repayments, shall remain available until June 30, 1924; and all repayments to the fund hereby created which shall be made subsequent to June 30, 1924, shall be covered into the Treasury, and shall not be withdrawn or applied except in consequence of a subsequent appropriation made by law."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the House disagree to Senate amendment No. 40.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there are a number of these amendments, and I do not wish to detain the committee as they come up. The House provided in the bill the sum of $400,000 for the department to use in advancing money to the Indians for agricultural implements, stock, seed, and such things as that, with the provision that it should be repaid, supposedly in annual payments ending in 1925. In the House provision as presented there was what was known as the revolving appropriation, which is carried in this and various other Senate amendments, but which is not included in the House proposition appropriating the $400,000.

Now, the Senate has proposed an amendment reducing the $400,000, which does not have the revolving appropriation, making it $100,000, and then added a lot of other items for various amounts which do carry the revolving appropriation. I do not express any opinion as to the amount of money which ought to be appropriated for the purpose, whether it should be a lump sum or segregated in various items, as is proposed by the Senate. I am perfectly willing to follow the conferees on that matter.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The amendment is No. 28.

Mr. MANN. I know what the amendment is. The department, and every department of the Government, is always seeking to have an opportunity to spend money without congressional control. The House of Representatives is the body that originates appropriating legislation. We pass the appropriation bills first. The committees of the House are the ones which more closely scan proposed appropriations. The committees of the House spend weeks on appropriation bills where the Senate committees do not spend days. The real consideration of most matters of appropriation is had in the House and not in the Senate. Hence I think it is the duty of the House to maintain its prerogatives in this regard.

Now, what the department wants and what the Senate has inserted is a provision that if the department spends $100,000 in this one case, payable back $10,000 a year, or whatever the sum may be, by 1925, they do not want that covered into the Treasury as it comes back in the way that ordinary receipts are covered in. They want the privilege, without a new appropriation, without submitting the matter again to Congress, to spend the money again. If we appropriate $100,000 for a specific item this year, payable in 10 years' time, with a revolving appropriation, and next year we appropriate another $100,000, and the next year another $100,000, with the revolving appropriation, the department soon has an enormous sum of money to expend as it pleases without asking for any congressional authority.

We all know that the permanent appropriation made for the Reclamation Service, however desirable it may have been to make it in that way in the first instance, which is a matter of controversy, has resulted in enormous wastefulness, and if the Interior Department had been required in the past to come to Congress each year and ask for the money that it wanted for reclamation improvement, and to state the projects it proposed to use the money for, we would have saved enormous sums of money, in my opinion, prevented a great deal of waste, and saved thousands of farmers who have gone on irrigation projects from penury and disaster.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois, and I believe the lump-sum appropriation in amendment No. 28, that has been reduced from $400,000 to $100,000, is entirely misleading, because while they have left $100,000 without the revolving provision they have added in other places an aggregate of about $800,000, so that instead of reducing the item from $400,000 to $100,000 they have added about $600,000. I want to say that as one of the conferees I shall stand by the House bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to disagree to Senate amendment No. 40.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, after line 9, insert:

"That so much of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L., 85), as makes reimbursable out of the tribal funds of the Indians of the San Carlos and Fort Apache Indian Reservations an appropriation for the construction of two bridges on the San Carlos Indian Reservation in Arizona be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman might ask unanimous consent to consider Senate amendments 41 to 50, inclusive.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the House disagree to Senate amendments 41 to 50, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House disagree to amendments of the Senate 41 to 50, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to Mrs. May Stanley, widow of Will H. Stanley, late superintendent of the Soboba Indian School in California, who lost his life in the discharge of his duty. Also to pay for medical and other necessary expenses, including funeral and administration expenses incurred in connection with the death of said Will H. Stanley and the shooting of Selso Serrano, Indian policeman, $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to disagree to all of these claims amendments in this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit an observation on No. 51.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I move to disagree to it and yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, amendment 51 is to pay to Mrs. Stanley $5,000. That is covered in a bill which the House passed on Tuesday night last, and it was a Senate bill; so that when our conferees go into conference they can properly insist that this item go out of this bill. The Senate passed a bill in the identical language of this Senate amendment and sent it over here, and the House Committee on Claims reported it, reducing the amount from $5,000 to $2,000 and cutting out the amount for medical and funeral expenses, and so forth. Those amendments were voted upon in the House on Tuesday night last, and were agreed to. The House then passed the Senate bill with those amendments, and it has gone back to the Senate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would not that have preference, then, over this amendment?

Mr. MANN. Oh, it would not have any preference; but if it goes in this bill the woman might get paid twice. However, we have acted upon the matter, and there is no excuse for the Senate insisting on this provision remaining in the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then the proper course is to disagree to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly; and to disagree to it in conference also. Let the Senate recede. They have the other matter before them.

I will now state that I am perfectly willing to let the gentleman run down to amendment 131, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will move to disagree to Senate amendments numbered 51 to 131.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an exception of 59, 60, and 61.

Mr. MANN. Then let the motion go from 51 to 58, inclusive.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to disagree to Senate amendments 51 to 58, inclusive.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 59: Pages 28 and 29, strike out section 7, as follows: "For support and education of 325 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Mount Pleasant, Mich., including pay of superintendent, $56,275; for general repairs and improvements, $5,000; in all, $61,275," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 7. For support and education of 350 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Mount Pleasant, Mich., and for pay of superintendent, $60,450; for general repairs and improvements, $6,000; for gymnasium and manual training buildings and equipment, $25,000; in all, $91,450."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment numbered 59.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, this amendment 59 raises the appropriation as submitted by the House in three different items. The one in which I am more particularly interested is the amount of $25,000 incorporated in the bill by the Senate for the purpose of establishing a gymnasium and manual training building and equipment for this institution. There are 325 Indian pupils in this school, and at the present time there is no manual training department. Every member of the committee knows, I think, that practically every high school in the country to-day has a manual training department. The gymnasium equipment is not what it should be, and I think all will agree that there is no race in the world to-day, or at least in this country, that is afflicted so generally with tuberculosis as is the Indian race, and I think the members of the committee will also agree that there is nothing that tends to combat the ravages of tuberculosis so much as proper exercise.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is a nonreservation school. It is not on an Indian reservation.

Mr. WOODRUFF. It is not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I see they have raised the number of Indians from 325 to 350.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that for many years the House and also the department has objected to increasing the number of pupils in nonreservation schools, and increasing the buildings, with a view to educating Indians on the reservations—in other words, to take the schools to the Indians and not the Indians to some outstanding nonreservation schools, and does not the gentleman believe himself that would be good policy?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Possibly; but I think the gentleman will find that there are not many reservations in Michigan. We have Indians in Michigan living everywhere throughout the State.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, if they are not on reservations, are they not citizens of the State?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Possibly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And voters of the gentleman's State?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Possibly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, do they not attend the public schools of the State?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I know of no instance where they do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Do the school laws of the State prohibit Indians from attending the schools with the white children?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think not; but as long as this is an educational institution and is being provided for by the Government for these Indians in Michigan, I think the facilities offered should be at least on a par with the average high school of the State.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be disagreed to.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to move to concur, but I trust that the conferees will do what they can to retain this item.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will assure the gentleman that we will give the matter careful consideration. There are several items in this bill where they have increased the number of pupils in the nonreservation schools and very largely increased the amount of money. The policy has been to give only enough money to keep the schools up to the present standard and not to enlarge the schools and give them new buildings that are not necessary.

Mr. MANN. But hope springs eternal in the human breast.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not think this presupposes the enlargement of any facilities they already have. I think it presupposes the building of a gymnasium and the other departments spoken of.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the motion of the gentleman cover amendments 59 to 69, both inclusive.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I will make that motion, to disagree to amendments 59 to 69, both inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ABERCROMBIE). The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to disagree to Senate amendments 59 to 69, both inclusive.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman will exclude from that No. 65 and also No. 67.

Mr. MANN. Then I suggest to the gentleman that he make his motion 59 to 64.

Mr. STEPHENS or Texas. Then I will add 59 to 64.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] moves to disagree to amendments numbered 59 to 64.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment numbered 65: Page 30, line 25, strike out "$215,000" and insert "$173,500."

Amendment numbered 66: Page 31, line 9, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$20,000."

Amendment numbered 67: Page 31, line 11, after the word "Indians," insert "to whom allotments have not heretofore been made."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that amendments numbered 65, 66, and 67 be considered together. They all relate to the same thing.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is no objection to that; it is all a part of the same subject matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Does the gentleman desire to disagree to all three amendments?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I move to disagree to those three amendments—65, 66, and 67—and I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a moment on this. I would like to call the attention of gentlemen who will certainly be conferees representing this body in the further consideration of this bill to this particular item. At my request in the consideration of this bill originally the item of $50,000 was inserted for the purpose of purchasing lands and homes for certain Indians now living in the Mille Lacs region of Minnesota. The $50,000 was not to come out of the United States Treasury, but to come out of the funds of the Indians themselves. These particular Indians are the ones who cling tenaciously to the spot where their ancestors had lived back through many generations. It is an ideally beautiful spot, where there is a magnificent and beauteous blending of blue sky, fine trees, and magnificent hills. You can not blame them for wanting to remain there. There are 402 of them. Some of them have allotments, but most of them have not. They are trespassers; they are almost outlaws in the sense that they are occupying a region belonging to the whites; but yet they prefer to remain there even under those conditions. It is desired that $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be used to purchase lands for these Indians on which they can make homes, so they will not be hunted or driven. The Indian Office or the Department of the Interior have exhausted every resource, and I may add that I myself have contributed every suggestion and aid that I could in the past 15 years to get these Indians to move, but it can not be done. Now the Senate has reduced the amount from $50,000 to $20,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me at that point?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that is a mistake, inasmuch as that is the only instance in this bill where they have reduced the amount? Does not the gentleman think they must have made a mistake?

Mr. MILLER. I think they have made a very great mistake, and I can not understand how it ever quite occurred; but I desire to make this statement in order that the conferees representing this body will see to it that this mistake is corrected and that no such inadvertence as this will pass and eventually be written into law. Twenty thousand dollars really is insufficient to purchase this land for these Indians. I am not sure it will take $50,000; I do not think it will; but that amount should be named in order that the Secretary of the Interior may use such sum up to that amount as circumstances may require.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman inform us how many of these Indians there are?

Mr. MILLER. There are 402.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why are they called homeless Indians?

Mr. MILLER. Because they have no home of their own. They are trespassers, literally, squatting upon lands not belonging to themselves, except a limited number, who live on land belonging to a hereditary chief.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman inform us why the President, by Executive proclamation, has not set apart some portion of the public land somewhere for these Indians?

Mr. MILLER. I do not think it would do any good, because there are no public lands in the State which can be used for that purpose, and you can not induce these Indians to go to another place. While it is true their property is all merged in property belonging to the Chippewas of Minnesota, yet it is a matter of fact that a suit has been successfully terminated, or practically terminated, against the United States Government for damages growing out of the use of land in this immediate vicinity where those people lived, and probably a million dollars will be recovered.

Now, while they have a per capita share in the general fund belonging to the Chippewas, they themselves have nothing now in their possession, and live a most precarious life, existing from hand to mouth, and at least a reasonable sum of money belonging to the Chippewas of the States should be utilized to give these people a permanent and suitable abiding place.

Mr. MANN. Would my friend yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What occupation do these Indians follow?

Mr. MILLER. They fish a little, pick some berries, and work by the day as opportunity for work exists among the farmers in that region. It is not in the vicinity of any industrial center, but it is a farming region that has been but recently settled; by recently I mean during the last 10 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address delivered by the Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE on the Fourth of July, at the dedication of the soldiers' monument at Southbridge, Mass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, these three reductions are among the few reductions made by the Senate in this bill since it left the House, and if the statements of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] are true these reductions probably are not warranted. The House gave a great deal of consideration to this bill when it was before us some weeks ago, and I was impressed then with the belief that many items in the bill were too large and could have been materially reduced without injury to the Indian Service. Now, when this bill comes back from the Senate we find it carrying something like two and a half million dollars more than it did when it left the House.

If a certain provision placed in the bill by the Senate be considered as an increase—that is, the $100 allotment—it will carry about four and one-half million dollars more than it carried when it left the House.

Mr. Chairman, just what has occurred to this bill has occurred to all appropriation bills on their return from the Senate to the House. I am not disposed to criticize any Member of either House of Congress, but I have wondered why it is that the other end of the Capitol has never learned to travel the other end of the road. Invariably we find they travel the end of the road which we call "increase" instead of that part which we call "decrease."

Now, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct in his statement that the House spends weeks in the consideration of the appropriation measures where the Senate spends days, that may account for it; but I have not been disposed myself to accredit the increases in these appropriation bills to a want of sufficient consideration. But what I am seriously at a loss to know is the reason why all these appropriation bills when they come back to the House from the Senate carry material and apparently unwarranted increases. This has been the practice for the last three years, to my personal knowledge. Members who have served in the House a long time have a better idea than I, perhaps, as to why these increases are so often and so persistently made by the Senate. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come when the House ought to stand by the appropriation bills that have been passed by it and refuse to agree to the enormous increases which are added by the Senate. I do not believe that the Senate ought to have a right to increase the appropriations, although that is the rule now, but I think it could employ its time a great deal more favorably to the country if it would learn to revise the appropriation bills as they come from the hands of the House downward instead of upward. This would act as a check upon the extravagance of the House, which is much needed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that we disagree to amendments Nos. 65, 66, 67, and 68.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] that we disagree to amendments 65, 66, 67, and 68.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask whether we can agree upon several amendments at this point.

Mr. MILLER. I suggest that we disagree to amendments 69 to 73, inclusive.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I ask that we disagree to amendments from No. 67 to No. 73, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] moves that the committee disagree to Senate amendments 69, 70, 71, 72, and 73, inclusive.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Now, if the gentleman will move to disagree to amendment No. 74, I would like to be heard on it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I move to disagree to amendment No. 74 without reading it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MILLER. Nos. 74 and 75.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No. 75 corrects No. 74.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] moves that the committee disagree to amendments Nos. 74 and 75.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized. I am more interested, I believe, in this provision than in almost any other provision in the entire bill, because it is a project that I have personally been advocating and working on for many years.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. To which one does the gentleman refer?

Mr. MILLER. To 74 and 75.

We have appropriated a large sum in an earlier part of the bill with which to fight malignant diseases among the Indians of the United States generally. I hope the membership of the House will observe the fact that this appropriation is for a like purpose, but does not come out of the United States Treasury, being paid for by the Indians themselves. The original plan was to build a single hospital in a State for the care of Indians in that State. It was shown that that was an inadvisable method of procedure. There are not many Indians in Minnesota—only 11,000—and they are scattered very widely in the northern part of the State. In one region known as the White Earth region about half of them are collected. The others are scattered into relatively small bands throughout the northeastern and north-central parts of the State. We appropriated two years ago out of the funds belonging to the Chippewa Indians $20,000 with which to build a hospital at White Earth to accommodate those Indians living at that place. That hospital has been successful. It has been an important and valuable adjunct in the treatment of trachoma and tuberculosis. It is desired, therefore, that the same aid and the same facilities accorded the White Earth Indians shall be extended to the other Indians residing in other parts of the State.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee why it is not feasible to have one central hospital rather than to have three?

Mr. MILLER. Because a central hospital necessitates the transportation of all the Indians such great distances that they are very much opposed to going, and the expense of taking them there is so great it makes it difficult.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose when they are conveyed there they are lodged in the hospital for a great length of time?

Mr. MILLER. Not all of them. Trachoma can be cured in a short length of time. For instance, to take an Indian from Grand Portage, which is in the extreme northeastern tip of the State of Minnesota, to White Earth, which is in the center of the Indian population of the State, would involve a journey of three or four days and require transportation by boat and by rail, changing cars twice, and involving an expenditure of, say, $100.

Mr. STAFFORD. So far as State hospitals are concerned, the gentleman is aware of the fact that they have one central institution for the entire citizenship of the State, and they have that because it is more economical.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; and the gentleman can very well add also that one single hospital can be much better constructed, much better equipped, and much better taken care of than can half a dozen. But in this particular work of treating trachoma and tuberculosis, it is desired to keep them scattered as much as possible, not to bunch them together in a great crowd, and to build smaller hospitals at places where they can be accessible to the various Indian tribes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that in the gentleman's State they have tuberculosis hospitals, as we have in Wisconsin?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And they are not distributed generally throughout the State?

Mr. MILLER. No.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that this has been raised from $50,000 to $75,000 by amendment numbered 74?

Mr. MILLER. I think it was by habit rather than by amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That would make $75,000 for these three?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We have adopted an amendment to the effect that these hospitals should cost no more than $12,500 each. Is it not a fact that in that country they have a worse climate than in New Mexico and Arizona? Is not that the reason why you ask $25,000 for each of the new hospitals?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Minnesota will permit, the gentleman from Texas having come over to the side I advocated on Tuesday, the gentleman said we adopted an amendment and put the price of these hospitals at $12,500. Inasmuch as I moved to do that and the gentleman from Texas strenuously, powerfully, and successfully defeated the proposition, why does he say we adopted it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We were trying to get it in conference, that is all.

Mr. MANN. You defeated it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to ask the gentleman from Minnesota with reference to his climate—whether it is necessary to use more money in that climate than elsewhere?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; this is the most rigorous climate, so far as that is concerned, in the State, and the hospital has to be protected from the cold and storm.

Now, that point which I particularly desire to mention I have not yet reached. I do not believe there is any need for three more hospitals. We already have one. Two more are needed, one for the Red Lake Indians, who occupy a region to the north and northwest of White Earth, and one for the scattered bands of Indians who occupy the northeastern part of the State.

Now, it was by reason of my personal knowledge of conditions in the northern part of our State and the condition of the Indians that the phraseology was framed as it was in the House bill, locating one of the two hospitals at Red Lake and locating the other of the two at the Fond du Lac Reservation. I understand the Indian Office requested the change. I know the Indian Office is wrong, all wrong, up and down, in and out. They want the privilege of locating these hospitals at any place they see fit, and I have my own personal reasons for knowing that their information is inadequate to enable them to tell where those hospitals ought to be located. And if the conferees are not able to prevail and to have the original language of this bill retained I beg of you here and now to strike it all out.

I am speaking for the Indians, among whom I travel every year in that State, and whose condition I know, and not for a set of bureaucratic employees who sit 1,500 miles away and have some hypothetical notions of their own. I make that strong and I make it emphatic, and I certainly will be glad to add to the statement if anything may be lacking in what I have already said.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman if this reservation is in the gentleman's district?

Mr. MILLER. Red Lake is not. Red Lake is in the extreme western part of the State. Fond du Lac is in my district.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman familiar with the country?

Mr. MILLER. I am. I have traveled over every foot of it. I know that the Fond du Lac is the place, beautifully located, beautifully situated for a hospital of this kind, and is accessible by reason of railway communication to all of the various scattered bands in the northeastern part of the State. We want to have those bands taken care of. Unless the language remains in the bill as originally drawn there will be no hospital for the Indians in the northeastern part of the State. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] moves that the committee disagree to amendments numbered 74 and 75. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I also move to disagree to Senate amendments numbered 76 down to 111.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee disagree to Senate amendments numbered 76 to 111.

Mr. MANN. From 76 to 110, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to disagree to Senate amendments numbered 76 to 110, inclusive. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have just one moment——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman——

Mr. MILLER. In which to call the attention of the conferees to amendment numbered 77, where it is provided that no appropriation exceeding $5,000 in amount can be made from the fund belonging to the Chippewas of Minnesota until such appropriation shall have been appropriated by a majority vote of the Indians cast in a regular election.

There are just two things I want to call attention to. I do not know the origin of this amendment. In the first place, that would prevent Congress from carrying out a treaty stipulation, which is about $167,000 each year of the funds belonging to these Indians shall be appropriated for certain specific purposes. Second, there is no tribe of Indians in Minnesota that could come under the description in this paragraph. There is no machinery by which a vote could be had of the Indians scattered in various bands of the State, even if there were a tribal organization.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will allow me a suggestion, third, several of these Senate amendments, making appropriations, make their sums immediately available, which would be in direct conflict with this amendment.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And I want to say to the gentleman that it would be requiring an annual referendum of what is now a solemn treaty.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. EVANS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] is recognized.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, referring to amendment 82, on page 38, that amendment has been placed in the bill by the Senate, providing that certain moneys shall not be used for the reclamation of certain lands in Montana until an opinion is rendered by the Attorney General. I sincerely hope the House will reject this amendment and that the conference committee will also reject it. I know of no reason why it should be in the bill.

The item referred to relates to the Flathead Indian Reservation, which is being reclaimed, and for which there has been an annual appropriation by Congress of from $200,000 to $400,000. In the hearings the Assistant Indian Commissioner appeared before the committee in my absence and asked finally for $100,000 for this purpose. I took up this matter with the commissioner, and the commissioner told me, in effect, that it was an error, and that he would recommend $250,000 for this year's appropriation. He told me positively and unequivocally that I should have that recommendation before the Indian Committee, while the bill was before that committee of the House.

Unfortunately I was called to Colorado on an investigation, and I could not get this recommendation from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I wired from Colorado, and was advised by his assistant that the commissioner was out of town, and consequently the matter never got before the House. These facts I know of my own knowledge. I was then told by the commissioner himself that he would place the recommendation before the Senate for $250,000. When it was placed before the Senate committee, it was done by a subordinate, or by the assistant commissioner, with this string tied to it, with this proviso requiring an opinion by the Attorney General.

If this proviso is adopted, you might as well abandon the expenditure of that money and the reclamation of that reservation. If you have to go to the Attorney General every time, why do we not go to the Attorney General with reference to the Fort Peck Reservation, the Blackfoot Reservation, the Crow Reservation, and every other reservation in the country before you spend a dollar?

I have my own opinion as to why the assistant commissioner has insisted on this proviso, but I am not quite prepared to give it to this committee at the present time; but I sincerely hope they will not encumber that work, or stop it by consenting to the adoption of this provision.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand the gentleman has no objection to disagreeing to this amendment.

Mr. EVANS. No; I want it disagreed to; and I hope the conferees will insist on rejecting it.

Amendment No. 81, which provides for the increase of the appropriation from $100,000 to $250,000, I favor. My objection is to the proviso attached, which is amendment No. 82, and reads:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Attorney General of the United States shall, after submission to him by the Secretary of the Interior of a request for an opinion thereon, hold affirmatively that, in his opinion, the Indians under existing law are protected and confirmed in their water rights.

Why this proviso should be attached is beyond my comprehension, unless it is simply to stop the work on this project, which it will no doubt very effectually do. If it is the intention of Congress or the Indian Bureau to abandon this work, let us do it in the open and not by subterfuge. If this appropriation is to be made, let it be made without conditions and subject to immediate use, or it will serve no useful purpose.

The work is in progress now, but new contracts must be entered into, and the Reclamation Bureau must know what money is to be available, that they may let their contracts for the ensuing year's work. Nobody knows when an opinion might be handed down by the Attorney General; and in the meantime the work is at a standstill, and in all probability the whole working force has been dissolved and discouraged.

With the permission of this House, I desire to incorporate in my remarks a brief summary of this project and the recommendations of the Reclamation Service for this year's appropriation:

Mr. MERITT. We offer for the record the following justification:

Irrigation system, Flathead Reservation, Mont. (reimbursable).

Fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, amount appropriated	$325,000.00
Fiscal year ended June 30, 1913:
Unexpended balance from previous year	85,429.63
Amount appropriated	200,000.00

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE—FLATHEAD PROJECT, MONTANA.

Justification for estimate of needs for irrigation work on the Flathead project, Montana, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915:

A minimum appropriation of $500,000 is required.

The work proposed to be done with the appropriation asked for consists of the following items:

1. Current expenses: The item for current expenses is presented to cover operation and maintenance costs and stream gauging. Operation and maintenance will return to the Government all, or a large part, of the expenditure on that account. The total for all expenditures takes this into account in that it exceeds the minimum appropriation of $500,000 asked for by $22,000.

2. Repairs to buildings and property: Repairs to buildings and property will cover repairs on existing camp buildings and maintenance work on the canal systems.

3. New construction: The following appear to be the most needed additions to the existing works for the reasons given below.

Additional storage should be provided. There are considerable areas in Polson, Post, and Pablo divisions not commanded by the present reservoir construction, and none of the Mission division is so covered. With the cultivation of additional areas and the coming of a dry year similar to the year 1910 storage will be absolutely necessary to insure irrigation in the areas named when irrigation is most needed, and the most available site for this purpose is St. Mary Lake, commanding all the area named and being apparently the cheapest site to develop. Water will be taken from branches of the Jocko River to storage in St. Mary Lake. About 5 miles of canal will serve for the first season, bringing water in from Fall Creek, and later 3 miles more of canal will be required for full supply. At the lake an outlet tunnel will be driven to lower its level, giving a storage capacity of 12,000 acre-feet below the present level.

The Pablo feeder canal will be extended south to tap Dry Creek, a distance of about 14 miles. Dry Creek is the natural outlet of St. Mary Lake, and this will complete the channel by which Jocko River water may be used where needed in Mission Valley between St. Ignatius and Polson, Mont. The extension of Pablo feeder canal will also form a distributing canal for over 9,000 acres of allotted land in Mission division, to reach all of which will require small laterals only.

The estimate includes the extension of small canals in Pablo division to reach 5,000 acres of new land about equally divided between allotments and homesteads.

In Post division it is proposed to build a canal from Post Creek to reach about 5,000 acres of new land lying from 5 to 10 miles north and west from St. Ignatius. This land is about one-third Indian allotments, the remaining two-thirds being held by homesteaders who are very anxious for water.

West of the Flathead River in Camas division there are about 15,000 acres of sagebrush land which has been divided into farm units practically all of which, where not Indian allotments, have been entered. The settlers have for three years tried dry farming, and at the present time the United States commissioner, resident at Camas, Mont., states that about one-fourth of all the settlers have left their places as they will not yield a living under dry farming. This land is most in need of water of any on the project, and it is proposed to begin work here by constructing the first 12 miles of conduit from the Little Bitter Root River, beginning near the north boundary of the reservation. The construction of a small dam at the Little Bitter Root Lake, in section 21, township 27 north, range 24 west, M. P. M., to store the entire run-off above that point is also included in the estimate.

Your attention is called to the fact that with annual appropriations of $500,000 each year it would require about 10 years to complete the Flathead project.

E. F. TABOR,
Project Engineer.

Approved, August 13, 1913.

CHAS. P. WILLIAMS,
Acting Supervising Engineer,
United States Reclamation Service.

You will observe that the engineers on the ground doing this work recommend an annual appropriation of $500,000 and advise that with that amount appropriated each year, it will take 10 years to complete the project. In my judgment, there is no more meritorious project in the whole Reclamation Service; and to appropriate only $100,000 annually it would take 60 years to consummate the work. It is a project where both the Indian and the white man are satisfied and want the work to go on. From the standpoint of economy it must appeal to you that it were better to appropriate a reasonably adequate sum to proceed with this work; every business man knows that every time work of this kind stops and again starts, there is great loss in disposing of the old organization and assembling the new, and much economy would be effected by continuous work with such equipment and force as a successful business man would assemble for carrying on a work of that magnitude. If, as it has been suggested, in appropriating this reimbursable money we are not doing justice to the Indian, then I suggest that if it is wrong to use $250,000, the ethics of the situation does not change when you cut it down and use $100,000.

My personal convictions are that the best possible use is being made of this money for both Indian and white man. The Indians can make no use whatever of their allotments unless they can get water; the lands opened by act of Congress to the white man are valueless to him and the Indian alike unless the work goes on. Three or four thousand homestead entrymen have purchased these Indian lands and made at least part of their payments under a tacit agreement with the Government that this reclamation work would go on. The lands will amply stand the expenditure for the work if it is carried on in an efficient and businesslike manner. A million and a half has already been expended, put largely into main canals, and it would be utter folly not to proceed now to the distribution of the water by lateral ditches and canals.

The resources from which these lands are being reclaimed belong to the Indian, but he is doubling and trebling his resources by the work and making his own land susceptible to cultivation and the production of splendid crops. If the Indian is to be civilized he must be taught by precept and example; he must be shown how to make his allotment yield him something, and in the case under discussion this can only be done by proceeding with reasonable diligence toward the consummation of this project. Our duty is to the Indian of the present generation, as well as those of the future, and the Indians of to-day who actually own the resources of this reservation should enjoy some of the fruits of their ownership and should not be compelled to starve to death on an allotment of unreclaimed land when there is abundance of water running untrammeled to the sea.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask for a vote on the motion to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The motion to disagree to the Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the relief for Salem, which is probably coming up to-morrow, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a list of the cases in which relief has been granted by Congress to sufferers by fire, flood, earthquake, disease, cyclone, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, Senate amendment No. 131 provides for the payment to the Creek Indians of the tribal funds now on deposit in the Treasury and in the National and State banks of Oklahoma a sum sufficient to equalize the allotments of all persons enrolled under the original Creek agreement of March 1, 1901, and the supplemental agreement of June 30, 1902, and the act of April 26, 1906, so that each may receive an amount which, added to the appraised value of the land already allotted, will make an amount equal to $800, including the land allotted. I am not opposed to the amendment, provided it is changed in form as I will indicate later on.

Senate amendment No. 137, which proposes to refer a claim of the Creek Indians to the Court of Claims, I am unalterably opposed to, because it is without merit and ought not to be adopted under any circumstances.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], in general debate when the Senate amendments were considered by the House in Committee of the Whole, stated a brief but accurate history of the so-called Creek equalization matter. Without going into it fully, I will say that the United States made an agreement with the Creek Nation, as they did with others of the Five Civilized Tribes, to allot their land, dispose of the surplus, and distribute the estates of the Indians equitably; the basis of equalization of the Creek Indians was fixed at $1,040.

All lands of said tribe, except as herein provided, shall be allotted among the citizens of the tribe by said commission so as to give each an equal share of the whole in value, as nearly as may be, in manner following: There shall be allotted to each citizen 160 acres of land—boundaries to conform to the Government survey—which may be selected by him so as to include improvements which belong to him. One hundred and sixty acres of land, valued at $6.50 per acre, shall constitute the standard value of an allotment and shall be the measure for the equalization of values; and any allottee receiving lands of less than such standard value may at any time select other lands which at their appraised value are sufficient to make his allotment equal in value to the standard so fixed.

If any citizen select lands the appraised value of which, for any reason, is in excess of such standard value, the excess of value shall be charged against him in the future distribution of the funds of the tribe arising from all sources whatsoever, and he shall not receive any further distribution of property or funds of the tribe until all other citizens have received lands and money equal in value to his allotment. If any citizen select lands the appraised value of which is in excess of such standard value, he may pay the overplus in money, but if he fail to do so the same shall be charged against him in the future distribution of the funds of the tribe arising from all sources whatsoever, and he shall not receive any further distribution of property or funds until all other citizens shall have received lands and funds equal in value to his allotment; and if there be not sufficient funds of the tribe to make the allotments of all other citizens of the tribe equal in value to his, then the surplus shall be a lien upon the rents and profits of his allotment until paid.

It will be noted that this act provided that any allottee receiving lands of less than the value of $1,040 was permitted to take additional lands sufficient to make his allotment equal in value to the standard so fixed; that if any allottee selected lands the appraised value of which was in excess of the standard value, the excess of value should be charged against him in the future distribution of the funds of the tribe, and he was not to receive anything until all other citizens had received lands and money equal in value to his allotment. Subsequently, in 1902, section 2 of the act of 1901 was amended in the following particulars:

All lands belonging to the Creek Tribe of Indians in Indian Territory, except town sites and lands reserved for Creek schools and churches, railroad, and town cemeteries, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved March, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 861), shall be appraised at not to exceed $6.50 per acre, excluding only lawful improvements on lands in actual cultivation. * * *

Paragraph 2 of section 3:

If any citizen select lands the appraised value of which is $6.50 per acre, he shall not receive any further distribution of property or funds of the tribe until all other citizens have received lands and moneys equal in value to his allotment.

SEC. 7. All children born of those citizens who are entitled to enrollment, as provided by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 861), subsequent to July 1, 1900, and up to and including May 25, 1901, and living upon the latter date, shall be placed on the rolls made by said commission. And if any such child has died since May 25, 1901, or may hereafter die before receiving his allotment of lands and distributive share of the funds of the tribe, the lands and money to which he would be entitled, if living, shall descend to his heirs as herein provided and be allotted and distributed to them accordingly.

SEC. 14. All funds of the Creek Nation not needed for equalization of allotments, including the Creek school fund, shall be paid out, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, per capita to the citizens of the Creek Nation on the dissolution of the Creek tribal government. (Idem, p. 764.)

By the amendment of 1902 it will be noted that the lands were to be appraised at not to exceed $6.50 per acre, regardless of their actual value, and $1,040 was adopted as the standard value of 160 acres. If the Indian happened to select a tract that was worth $16,000, as some tracts that were allotted were actually worth, he was only charged with $1,040. Lands of less than the standard value were appraised on the same basis, so that lands worth $10, $20, or $30 an acre were appraised or valued as low as $1, $2, or $3 an acre. In other words, a great many were undoubtedly allotted lands of a greater value than $1,040, but were charged with a very much less amount, and they are now demanding, because there are not sufficient tribal funds to pay them the difference between the value of their allotments as charged and $1,040, that the United States make an appropriation sufficient to pay them. When the allotments were made many of the Indians, where the land was of less value that $1,040, were given a statement or "due bill" showing that they had been allotted a particular tract of a stated valuation, and if it was less than the $1,040 the statement showed the amount due them. These statements or due bills were in the following form:

Section 7 of the 1901 act as amended in 1902 provided that all children born subsequent to July 1, 1900, and up to and including May 25, 1901, and living on the latter date, should be enrolled. The Indian appropriation act of March 3, 1905, contained the following provision:

That the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes is authorized for 60 days after the date of approval of this act to receive and consider application for enrollments of children born subsequent to May 25, 1901, and prior to March 4, 1905, and living on said latter date, to citizens of the Creek Tribe of Indians whose enrollment has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior prior to the date of the approval of this act; and to enroll and make allotments to such children. * * * (33 Stat. L., pt. 1, p. 1071.)

That the provision in the Indian appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell the residue of the lands of the Creek Nation not taken as allotments is hereby repealed and the provision of the Creek agreement, article 3, approved March 1, 1901, is hereby restored and reenacted. (Idem., 1072.)

The act of April 26, 1906, providing for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, provided by section 2 as follows:

SEC. 2. That for 90 days after approval hereof applications shall be received for enrollment of children who were minors living March 4, 1906, whose parents have been enrolled as members of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, or Creek Tribes. * * *

It was these last acts, providing for the enrollment and allotment of the new borns, that furnished the basis for the claim now asserted by the Creek Nation and which is proposed to be referred to the Court of Claims by Senate amendment No. 137. Had it not been for legislation adding new borns, and had the allotments been made as contemplated by the original act, there would have been sufficient surplus land that would have been disposed of to have produced ample funds to pay each and every person holding these due bills what was coming to them up to $1,040, and there would have been a surplus remaining to be distributed as contemplated by section 17 of the act of April 26, 1906, which act is as follows:

SEC. 17. That when the unallotted lands and other property belonging to the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Tribes of Indians have been sold and the moneys arising from such sales or from any other source whatever have been paid into the United States Treasury to the credit of said tribes, respectively, and when all the just charges against the funds of the respective tribes have been deducted therefrom, any remaining funds shall be distributed per capita to the members then living or to the heirs of deceased members.

The reason why Congress enacted legislation for the enrollment of new borns was because the Indians of their own motion, by a resolution adopted by their council, declared in favor of such legislation and requested legislation authorizing it.

The Creek council consists of two bodies, the same as a State legislature, one being the house of warriors and the other the house of kings. The resolution that was passed by the council as the basis for the legislation enrolling new borns, as provided by the acts of March 3, 1905, and April 26, 1906, is as follows:

OKMULGEE, IND. T., November 3, 1904.

Whereas the tribal relations of the Muskogee Nation do not expire until March 4, 1906; and

Whereas all children born to the citizens of said nation, so long as said tribal relations shall exist, are in truth and in fact citizens in the fullest sense of the word and are in conscience and equity entitled to all the rights and benefits by virtue of such birth and citizenship; and

Whereas there will be a vast amount of surplus land when the present plan of allotting will have been finally closed, estimated to be as much as 500,000 acres; and

Whereas it is a part of the unwritten as well as the written history of the country that the Creek Nation regard with sacred solemnity their every obligation, implied as well as declared:

Be it resolved by the national council of the Muskogee Nation, That the delegation or commission elected at this session of the national council be directed to request and vigorously urge the Congress of the United States to make all the necessary provisions for the selecting and allotting of 160 acres of land to each and every Creek citizen born since the 25th day of May, 1901, and living up to and including the 4th day of March, 1906.

Adopted November 3, 1904.

There were 2,918 children added to the rolls by the act of April 26, 1906. They were given allotments, and I believe were also given due bills or statements showing that they had a balance due them, the same as given to those allotted originally when the value of the land allotted was less than $1,040. By allotting these newborn children there was not enough land left to produce sufficient proceeds to provide the money necessary to equalize the allotments on the $1,040 basis; and, therefore, it is proposed by Senate amendment No. 137 to refer the matter to the Court of Claims, which would probably result in a judgment against the United States that would make it necessary to make a large appropriation out of the Treasury to pay the same—probably $3,000,000 or $4,000,000. As I have already stated, the newborns were allotted at the request of the Creek Nation by a resolution adopted by its council. It is claimed that because the resolution was not signed by the governor of the Creek Nation it did not become effective, but under the Creek constitution the failure of the governor to approve it within five days made it a law without his approval.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. For a question.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that at the time the resolution was passed, there was a treaty, under the Curtis Act, that prohibited any resolution or law affecting lands to be valid until approved by the President, and, therefore, if the governor had done so, it would have been invalid and would have amounted to nothing more than a petition.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The fact is the resolution was found in the desk of Chief Porter after his death and was not forwarded to the President until some two years after its adoption. I do not know whether it was approved by the President when it was received, or whether it has since been approved, but it may have been. If Executive approval was necessary, it could have been approved when it was received or at any subsequent time, which would have made it legal.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Not if approved that late.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Regardless of whether it was approved by the President or not, the Indians are estopped and are bound by the action of their council in adopting the resolution asking Congress to enroll the newborns. I am reliably informed that such a resolution as was passed by the council did not require the approval of the President, as it was a mere memorial and was not within the acts that require the President's approval. If that is true, then there is nothing whatever in the claim that the resolution was not passed in accordance with the law.

If the Indians are not bound by the action of their council in memorializing Congress to enroll their children, then they can not assert any claim against the United States, because, if there is any merit in the claim that has been asserted and which it is proposed to send to the Court of Claims by Senate amendment No. 137, it is because of the fact that the United States is liable to distribute the estate and allot the lands as provided in the acts of 1901 and 1902, which acts were only made effective by the approval of the Creek Council. If the council had power to represent and bind the members of the Creek Nation in said acts of 1901 and 1902, then it must have had the same authority with relation to the subsequent acts, and therefore I again maintain that the Creek Nation is estopped from asserting any claim against the United States because the newborns were allotted.

To show what the result would be in some instances, if the contention of those who are asserting that this claim has merit should prevail, I want to cite how it might affect some Indians. Take an allottee who received land valued at $900. The land may have been worth $3,000, or $6,000, in fact, but he was given a due bill calling for $140. Suppose he had five children born between the time that he was allotted and the act authorizing newborns to be enrolled and allotted; he would have had five children allotted each 160 acres of land, and yet he would ask Congress to appropriate $140 to pay him in cash, claiming that he had been wronged because each of his five children had received an allotment. That is the proposition, so far as the Indian is concerned who may have had five children.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman fully state the proposition? The gentleman's statement was that the man whose children had been allotted would be asking for an additional amount of money. Is it not a fact that not only the man but all of his children are asking an additional amount of money, that the children who have been given $800 as a gift want us to increase the amount for them out of the general fund?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; as I have already stated, the children were given due bills between the value of the land allotted and $1,040, and it is proposed by sending the matter to the Court of Claims to make it possible for a judgment to be rendered against the United States to pay the children the amount due them. Take the case I have just illustrated, and if the lands allotted to the five children were valued at $600 in each case, each would have a due bill for $440; so, in addition to appropriating $140 to pay the father, we would be required to appropriate $2,200 to pay the children. I think the House will see that there is absolutely no merit in this claim. My contention is that Congress has plenary power to administer the trust estate of its wards; and with reference to the Creek Nation, its council having by resolution requested the United States to enroll and allot newborns, and the result, in effect, being a mere change in the form of the distribution of the tribal property, and being to the material advantage of practically all of the individual members of the Creek Nation, that there is not only no legal claim against the Government on the part of the Creek Nation, but that the claim is without equity, and, as already stated, is without merit.

As to the status of the Five Civilized Tribes and their relation to the United States, the question was very clearly set forth by the Supreme Court in the case of Cherokee Nation v. Hitchcock (187 U. S., 294), and the court, in concluding that case, said:

> The power existing in Congress to administer upon and guard the tribal property, and the power being political and administrative in its nature, the manner of its exercise is a question within the province of the legislative branch to determine, and is not one for the courts.

In the case of Lone Wolf v. Hitchcock (187 U. S., 553) the Supreme Court stated that the power of Congress is plenary. The court uses this language:

> In effect, the action of Congress now complained of was but an exercise of such power, a mere change in the form of investment of Indian tribal property, the property of those who, as we have held, were, in substantial effect, the wards of the Government. We must presume that Congress acted in perfect good faith in the dealings with the Indians of which complaint is made, and that the legislative branch of the Government exercised its best judgment in the premises. In any event, as Congress possessed full power in the matter, the judiciary can not question or inquire into the motives which prompted the enactment of this legislation. If injury was occasioned, which we do not wish to be understood as implying, by the use made by Congress of its power, relief must be sought by an appeal to that body for redress and not to the courts. The legislation in question was constitutional, and the demurrer to the bill was therefore rightly sustained.

I think these authorities settle the question as to the power of Congress in administering the tribal property of Indians, and that where Congress has acted in perfect good faith in its dealings with the Indians and a complaint is made against such action by the Indians, Congress is the tribunal to determine the merits of the complaint and it is not a question for the courts; that in enacting the legislation providing for the enrollment and allotment of the newborn children it was not only requested by the Creek Nation through its duly elected and constituted legislative council, but it was beneficial and wise and materially to the advantage of the Indians, and therefore there is no equity in favor of the claim, and it can not successfully be asserted that there is any legal claim.

With relation to Senate amendment No. 131, which proposes to distribute the Creek fund on an $800 basis, I stated in the outset that I am not opposed to it provided it is changed in form. The purpose of it is to distribute the money belonging to the Creek Nation now in the Treasury and in Oklahoma banks. The money belongs to them, and we ought not to withhold it; and the only reason it has not been paid before was because of the claim which is involved in Senate amendment No. 137, that I have just discussed. In my opinion the reason that the money was not paid several years ago was because of the activities of certain attorneys who were seeking to obtain contracts to receive a percentage of what the Indians might recover from the United States, provided the matter should be referred to the Court of Claims.

In 1909 a provision was incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill, which became a law March 3, 1909, directing the payment to the Indians of the money in the Treasury on the basis of $800, provided the Creek Council would adopt a resolution accepting it in full of all claims or demands, so far as the equalization claim is concerned. The provision referred to is as follows:

> Immediately after July 1, 1909, and prior to December 1, 1909, to pay allottees out of the funds of the Creek Nation the amounts severally due for the equalization of their allotments. In making such payment for the equalization of the Creek allotments $800 shall be taken as the standard value of an allotment: Provided, That the payment of such funds for the equalization of allotment shall be a final and conclusive settlement of all claims for the equalization of allotments in the Creek Nation: And provided further, That as a condition precedent to any such payment the Creek national council shall pass an act, in form approved by the Secretary of the Interior, discharging the United States from all claim and demand on this account.

There is no question in my mind, Mr. Chairman, but what that proposition would have been accepted by the Indians, and the money would have been distributed and paid to them, under the act, had it not been for the fact that certain attorneys holding contracts, or endeavoring to secure contracts, with the Creek Nation, or members thereof, conducted a campaign throughout the Nation, holding mass meetings and representing to the Indians that if they declined to accept the $800 equalization payment they would see to it that legislation would be enacted providing that they be paid on a $1,040 basis; that the attorneys, as usual, were looking after their own interests is apparent, because in some of the contracts between the Indians and attorneys it is provided that 10 per cent shall be paid to the attorneys, not only for any amount that might be recovered over and above the amount in the Treasury, but also on the amount in the Treasury about which there is no contention. The Government is holding the money for the Indians, and is willing and ready to pay it to them, and would have done so, as stated, were it not for this alleged claim. The fund now on deposit in the Treasury and in Oklahoma banks is nearly $4,000,000, as will appear by the following statement:

Balance in United States Treasury, Mar. 31, 1914, of Creek Nation, Oklahoma.

Fulfilling treaties with Creeks		$551.45
Creek general fund		2,472,946.15
Interest on Creek general fund		160,823.94
Indian moneys, proceeds of labor:
Creek cattle tax	$1,791.60
Creek right of way	25,989.24
Creek royalties, grazing, etc	13,185.73
Creek stone and timber	690.39
Creek town lots	20,030.00
Creek unallotted lands, etc	79,049.12
		2,775,057.62
Amount due from bonded Oklahoma banks, Mar. 31, 1914, under act Mar. 3, 1911 (36 Stat. L., 1070):
Unallotted lands	$322,900.00
Town lots	702,450.00
Accrued interest Dec. 31, 1913	57,619.59
		1,082,969.59
Total funds		3,858,027.21

There should be added to the amount, as shown by the above statement, about $60,000 accrued interest to July 1, 1914. Ten per cent of the money belonging to the Indians, as shown by this statement, would be $400,000, which would be a very nice fee for performing no service.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman is entirely right about that, that outside attorneys have a lot of contracts and had a lot to do with this, but I think it is fair to state that as the provision now stands the suit is to be brought by the regular tribal attorney who is paid out of the tribal funds.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In reply to the gentleman I want to say that there is nothing in this Senate amendment that limits the employment of attorneys except that it provides that the petition shall be verified and the suit be prosecuted by the national attorney for the Creek Nation. There is no doubt in my mind but what attorneys now holding contracts, if this amendment is adopted, will assert their claims, and there is nothing in the amendment that precludes them from doing so.

Mr. FERRIS. I think they ought to be precluded. There is not anything in their favor.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have a proposition that I expect to propose in conference if Senate amendment No. 131 is not agreed to, as a substitute therefor. My substitute follows substantially the amendment of the Senate, except that it provides that as a condition precedent to the payment of the money the Creek national council shall pass an act discharging the United States from all claim and demand on account of this claim. It also contains a provision that any contract or contracts made by the Creek Nation or any individual member thereof, with any attorney or attorneys, providing for the payment of any amount for services in connection with the Creek equalization, shall be void and have no force or effect unless the same shall have been executed and approved in accordance with the law in existence at the time of the making of such contract with relation to contracts with Indians, and it further provides that the money paid to allottees shall be exempt from any lien for attorney fees or other debt contracted prior to the passage of the act.

No attorney should receive any commission whatever on account of the payment of the money belonging to the Indians to their credit in the Treasury and in Oklahoma banks; that the Government is ready and willing to pay them, and I want to make it impossible for any contracts to be enforced, so far as this money is concerned, either with the nation or with individuals. There are a large number of individual contracts that provide for a fee of 10 per cent, and possibly much higher, to be paid to attorneys from the money received by the individual allottee.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I am heartily in favor of that provision which the gentleman has suggested being added as an amendment, which cuts the attorneys out. For instance, these Indians take from their own fund $5,000 and pay it for their own attorney, and their own attorney ought to bring the suit, and it is proper that he should, and that no one else should get anything out of it; but let me ask the gentleman about this language on page 68, beginning with line 10:

> Said suits shall be begun by petitions filed within six months after the approval of this act, which petitions shall be verified and prosecuted by the national attorney for the Creek Nation.

Of course that does not let the attorneys in.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But it does not preclude attorneys from coming in.

Mr. FERRIS. We ought to have the gentleman's amendment, too.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes. I want to say, however, that if Congress ever sends this claim to the Court of Claims, as contemplated by Senate amendment No. 137, and it results in a judgment against the United States of three or four or five million dollars, whoever is responsible for securing the legislation ought to receive a very substantial compensation, because without willful effort on the part of some one Congress would not make it possible for a judgment to be entered upon a claim so wholly without merit as is this claim. I want to make it difficult, if not impossible, to obtain legislation giving life to all kinds of unmeritorious Indian claims such as in the past have resulted in large judgments being entered against the Government by the Court of Claims and in the payment of exorbitant and unconscionable fees that have caused scandal and discredited Congress.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I know the gentleman always stands right on these attorney's fees, and I know he does not approve any of this grafting and snitching that goes on around this Capitol; but at the same time, as long as these Indians hire attorneys through the Interior Department, and the Interior Department selects them and pays for them out of their own money, why not cut out all outside attorneys?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That would be doubtful.

Mr. FERRIS. If these attorneys are not competent, we ought to get rid of them and get somebody else.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think if an Indian is being denied his rights or thinks that he is being wronged, and especially where valuable property rights are involved, he ought to be permitted to be represented by counsel of his own selection, rather than by counsel selected by his guardian, and therefore I never have been willing to consent to legislation that would preclude an Indian from employing counsel. All I want to do, so far as Indians having the right to employ attorneys is concerned, is to limit the compensation that may be paid and to see that the compensation is reasonable. The gentleman knows that I was chairman of a committee that was authorized to investigate the subject of Indian contracts with attorneys in 1910. The committee found, and so reported to Congress, that there had been fees amounting to about $4,000,000 paid out of the Treasury of the United States to attorneys, and we denounced most of the fees that had been so paid as exorbitant, unconscionable, and in contravention of public policy. It is this that I want to stop.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman's committee did a very valuable service and I approve every bit of it, and I approve of all this business of attorney's fees being knocked out. But the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma have their own attorneys designated, first, by the governors of the respective tribes, and who must be acceptable to the Interior Department, and they are in truth and in fact largely appointed by the Interior Department. They are paid by money out of the Indian funds, and if the attorneys they have are not sufficient, are not capable, they ought to discharge them and get men capable; but while they are capable, as I believe them to be, and while the Indians are paying them from their own funds, I ask who can represent them better than the attorneys of their own selection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman is an attorney himself, and certainly I do not think that he would be in favor of such an extreme proposition as is contemplated by Senate amendment No. 140. This proposition seeks to make any and all contracts with members of the Five Civilized Tribes void and of no effect, and the collection or receipt of any moneys shall constitute an offense punishable by a fine of not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or both, regardless of whether the services rendered were valuable or whether the compensation of the attorneys is reasonable or unreasonable. To enact such a provision would not only be extreme, but ridiculous, and I do not believe the gentleman is the author of the amendment or that he favors it.

Mr. FERRIS. No; I am not the sire of amendment numbered 140 and I have not even read it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should hope not.

Mr. FERRIS. But I want to say that my State has suffered, our delegation has suffered, our very influence has suffered, our feelings have suffered from too much of this outside attorney business and I am pretty tender on that proposition. I do not want to be characterized as a populist by saying I do not believe men ought to have attorneys when they need them, but it is a tender question in our State. Our Indians have been robbed and our State has been slandered. We do not want any more of it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. For the information of the gentleman and the Members of the House, I want to cite a case in my own State for the purpose of showing what a wrong and injustice would have been done to an Indian woman if she had not been permitted to employ counsel. She was a member of one of the Sioux tribes and was denied the right of allotment. She selected a 320-acre tract and moved upon it and made a formal application to be allotted. The Indian Office refused to allot her, and held that she did not have sufficient Indian blood to entitle her to be allotted. The case was pending in the Interior Department for a number of years, first before the commissioner and then before the Secretary of the Interior, and notwithstanding she was represented by counsel, in every instance the decision was against her. In other words, her guardian, instead of protecting her in her rights, was endeavoring to deny them.

When the matter was finally decided by the Interior Department her attorney went into the United States court, and there she was resisted not only by the Interior Department but by the Department of Justice, and the attorneys of that department represented the Indian Office in endeavoring to prevent her from obtaining her legal rights. After an expensive and protracted trial the court entered judgment in favor of the woman and held that she was entitled to be allotted. If the contention that Indians should not be allowed to employ attorneys had obtained and this woman had been compelled to submit to the decision of the Interior Department, she would have been denied not only the right to be allotted 320 acres of land, but to participate in the distribution of tribal funds belonging to the tribe of which she is a member. There is no question about it, in my judgment, and we ought not to go so far as to say that Indians shall not have counsel in certain cases.

Mr. FERRIS. There is a great deal of truth in what the gentleman says; but why could not this specific isolated case the gentleman mentions go to her national attorney, who gets $5,000 a year, paid for out of the Indian funds? Why could not her case have been laid before him and have him prosecute it?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Because, Mr. Chairman, my information is—and if I am mistaken about it, I would like to be corrected—that it is not the duty of tribal attorneys, and this is true also of the attorneys for the different nations of the Five Civilized Tribes, to represent individual Indians in matters affecting them or their property personally.

Mr. FERRIS. What about the probate attorneys? They ought to be of some assistance.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Well, I believe you do have some probate attorneys, but they only look after probate matters. Suppose an Indian has been done an injustice, or thinks he has been wronged, by a probate court in Oklahoma, would he deny the Indian the right to employ counsel to determine his rights?

Mr. FERRIS. I would, if we would know that later they would come along and reach an arm into the crib and get out of the trust funds to pay himself; at some later time from some new Congress, some new Secretary, some new Indian Commissioner, who did not know anything about what had previously happened; but if he could not use the national attorney or probate attorney he could go into his own pocket and pay them. I am tired of so many outside attorneys on contingent fees. Of course I know the gentleman feels the same way.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Senate amendment No. 140 not only makes void contracts made with citizens of the Five Civilized Tribes, but, as I have already stated, it also makes it a criminal offense for an attorney to receive any money as a fee. There are two Senate amendments in this bill proposing to enroll quite a number of persons who have not been enrolled members of the Five Civilized Tribes. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma or any gentleman in this House think that that provision would be in this bill, or that there ever would have been a suggestion to Congress that the names of these persons should be added to the rolls if it had not been that they are represented by attorneys? I have no doubt that most of them are represented by reputable attorneys, and they have rendered valuable service, and why should they not be compensated? I presume most of the persons whose names it is proposed to add to the rolls are without any means, and the attorneys representing them have not only rendered their services so far without receiving anything, but have also borne whatever expense may have been incurred, and they should not only be allowed compensation, but they should be liberally compensated. So I say to the gentleman that while I entertain in a large measure the views that he entertains with relation to unconscionable fees and especially fees where the contingent service depends upon securing legislation, when it comes to the question of saying that no Indian shall have the right to be represented by counsel, I certainly can not go that far, and I am sure the gentleman from Oklahoma will agree with me.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I would like to know the names of the attorneys in this Creek matter, if the gentleman has them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman the hearings with relation to the Creek equalization discloses that there are several attorneys that are interested in contracts with the Indians. Among them are Messrs. Kappler & Merillat, Messrs. Butler & Vail, Messrs. Ballinger & Lee, a man by the name of Maxey, and Mr. Powell had an interest. Mr. Powell, I believe, is now deceased, but there is a letter in the hearings to his widow assuring her that she will be protected and will receive the fee that Mr. Powell would be entitled to.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Those were the attorneys you referred to awhile ago before you were interrupted by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I had no intention of bringing in the names of any attorneys, and with relation to some of the attorneys in connection with this Creek equalization claim I want to say that they have apparently been urging this claim upon Congress in a perfectly legitimate manner, having on several occasions presented it to the Indian Committees of both the House and Senate. When I refer to some of the scandalous fees that have been paid to attorneys for lobbying services, I speak generally, and it does not matter whether they live in St. Louis, Washington, or elsewhere. They ought to be put out of business.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. But whether right or wrong, are they the attorneys in this Creek equalization matter?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have told the gentleman who the attorneys are, so far as I know and remember them, that are interested in contracts with the Creek Nation or members thereof. While we are on the subject of attorneys' fees, I want to read from the report made by the commission appointed in 1910, of which I was the chairman, and of which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] were members, because it is interesting and, I believe, appropriate at this time.

We found as follows:

> Many Indian claims, antiquated and without meritorious basis, have been trumped up against the Government by industrious attorneys, claim agents, and professional lobbyists until there is now pending, in one form or another, in the departments and before Congress, claims of this character amounting to many millions of dollars.

And I will say in passing that we found, and so reported, one attorney in this city who had contracts for something more than $20,000,000, with his fee amounting to from 10 to 40 per cent, as I remember.

Further, the report says:

> Of course the purpose of those actively engaged in exploiting such claims is to obtain the fee contracted for upon a contingent basis. The effect of such compensation for adventurers who, quoting the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, "make market of themselves in this way," should receive the careful consideration of Congress. The committee is of the opinion that the court could not have expressed itself more pertinently to many contracts which have been the subject of investigation by this committee within the past eight months than it did in the case of Marshall v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. (57 U. S., 314, 335) when it said:
> "Bribes, in the shape of high contingent compensation, must necessarily lead to the use of improper means and the exercise of undue influence. Their necessary consequence is the demoralization of the agent who covenants for them; he is soon brought to believe that any means which will produce so beneficial a result to himself are 'proper means'; and that a share of these profits may have the same effect of quickening the perceptions and warming the zeal of influential or 'careless' Members in favor of his bill."

We also cited another decision of the Supreme Court, from which we quoted as follows:

> In the case of Trist v. Child (24 U. S., 441, 451) the court expressed itself as follows:
> "The agreement in the present case was for the sale of the influence and exertions of the lobby agent to bring about the passage of a law for the payment of a private claim, without reference to its merits, by means which, if not corrupt were illegitimate, and, considered in connection with the pecuniary interest of the agent at stake, contrary to the plainest principles of public policy. No one has a right in such circumstances to put himself in a position of temptation to do what is regarded as so pernicious in its character. The law forbids the inchoate step, and puts the seal of its reprobation upon the undertaking."
> In the same case the court continued by making the following observations:
> "If any of the great corporations of the country were to hire adventurers who make market of themselves in this way to procure the passage of a general law with a view to the promotion of their private interests, the moral sense of every right-minded man would instinctively denounce the employer and employed as steeped in corruption and the employment as infamous.
> "The prohibition of the law rests upon a solid foundation. A private bill is apt to attract little attention. It involves no great public interest and usually fails to excite much discussion. Not infrequently the facts are whispered to those whose duty it is to investigate, vouched for by them, and the passage of the measure is thus secured. If the agent is truthful and conceals nothing, all is well. If he uses nefarious means with success, the springhead and the stream of legislation are polluted. To legalize the traffic of such service would open a door at which fraud and falsehood would not fail to enter and make themselves felt at every accessible point. It would invite their presence and offer them a premium. If the tempted agent be corrupt himself and disposed to corrupt others, the transition requires but a single step. He has the means in his hands, with every facility and a strong incentive to use them. The widespread suspicion which prevails, and charges openly made and hardly denied, lead to the conclusion that such events are not of rare occurrence. Where the avarice of the agent is inflamed by the hope of a reward contingent upon success and to be graduated by a percentage upon the amount appropriated, the danger of tampering in its worst form is greatly increased."

Our commission further found that in securing legislation resulting in reviving certain outlawed Indian claims by having jurisdictional acts passed sending them to the Court of Claims, in some instances attorneys holding contingent contracts that resulted in the payment of unconscionable fees paid in some of the cases retained and employed former Senators and former Members of the House of Representatives, where their compensation was contingent upon legislation being secured and a judgment obtained. In other words, the principal service of former Members of Congress, apparently, was entirely directed toward securing the legislation necessary to make it possible for a suit to be instituted against the Government. In the report of the committee we expressed our disapproval of former Senators and Members of the House of Representatives appearing in matters where legislation is desired to be procured through their activities, as well as in matters requiring executive and departmental approval, and expressed the opinion that such practice should be discouraged. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that most of the legislation that has resulted in exorbitant and unconscionable fees has been secured by lobbyists and by methods unprofessional, if not reprehensible. These attorneys and lobbyists do not, as a rule, appear before committees of Congress and present their arguments as legislation is usually presented. I have made a careful inquiry to ascertain how many jurisdictional acts that referred Indian claims to the Court of Claims were obtained, and I find that in practically every case it was by an amendment inserted in the Indian appropriation bill after it left the House and agreed to in conference. This ought to teach us that legislation with reference to claims ought not to be tolerated on the Indian or any other appropriation bill, and personally I would like to see a joint rule adopted by the House and Senate making it impossible for a claim amounting to more than a few hundred dollars to be in order on any appropriation bill.

With relation to the Creek claim which it is proposed to refer to the Court of Claims by Senate amendment No. 137, in conclusion I want to say that it has been investigated by the Indian Committee of the House several times since I have been a Member, and I think there have been some hearings before the committee in the present Congress; if not, there were in the last and the preceding Congresses to my knowledge. It has never yet been reported favorably, and if it had been pressed it would have been rejected by practically a unanimous vote.

I hope that amendment No. 131 will be disagreed to, so that in conference it may be perfected in accordance with the suggestions that I have made, and that amendment No. 137 will be disagreed to, and that it will be eliminated from the bill in conference, which I think will be the end of it, for the reason that I am confident the Indians will accept payment in accordance with the substitute that I will propose for amendment No. 131 and which I have explained.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, we are under the five-minute rule, and I understand the gentleman from Oklahoma desires to reply to some of the statements made by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a similar request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York also asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to limit the discussion to such time as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] thinks he may need.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I want about 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma may be allowed to proceed for 20 minutes, and after the conclusion of his remarks that debate on Senate amendments Nos. 131 and 137 close.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman from Oklahoma having 20 minutes, but we may want a little more time on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CREEK EQUALIZATION AMENDMENT.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, this entire matter is a question largely involving the claim of the Creek Indians. Before I get into the subject, I want to refer to the matter of attorneys' fees, as discussed by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], who has just preceded me. My views as to attorneys' fees are largely the same as my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] states. It is a very delicate and "touchy" question in my State; nevertheless, I have never failed to state my conviction upon these questions freely and fearlessly. So far as the attorneys shown in the records of the Creek equalization claim are concerned, of Messrs. Kappler and Vail I know nothing but honorable conduct. The other gentleman we are engaged now in fighting in the matter of the Mississippi Choctaw claims. Personally I am not very anxious that they should get a fee out of the Creek equalization payment, whatever may occur. On the other hand, I do not think that I should be serving good, wholesome policies to attempt to deny any man a legitimate claim on personal grounds or because I dislike him. A criminal should have justice.

It is also true, as intimated by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], that the general tribal attorney has so many different questions to handle that he can not handle such a large question as the citizenship case. It is also true that the probate attorneys can not do it. As a matter of fact, it would not be wise to leave those tribes to the mercy of either the probate attorney or the general attorney in a general citizenship question, because it is a special question. If I had a regular attorney who handled my business affairs, paid by the year, and I had unexpectedly a criminal charge, I certainly would want a criminal lawyer.

This is an age of specialists, and I can count on the fingers of one hand the name of every attorney who could handle rightly a citizenship question in the Chickasaw and Choctaw country. So, as stated by the gentleman, in those cases it is wisest for the tribe to have special attorneys for that work, but I would not vote to give the attorneys referred to in the record, or any other Indian attorney, any kind of a fee, either out of the Indian fund or the Government fund, for the reason that we have no way of telling what they have earned.

I would not pay them especially to lobby or for lobby services, I would, though, vote to permit the payment of fees in cases that require the real services of a lawyer to go into the courts, and in such cases neither I nor anyone else in Congress would really know what he earned, and in that event it would be the part of wisdom to let the court determine what an equitable fee would be. The court only could know the legal services he had performed.

Now, in general, that is my view of the attorneys' fees question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. In a moment. I will say that I have read the two volumes of the report made by the gentleman from South Dakota and other members of the Indian investigating committee, who went to my State in 1910 and conducted an investigation of some serious bribery charges made by a United States Senator, and charges relating to Indian contracts. I have read the two volumes of that report with care and interest, and I approve the gentleman's report upon that matter, because I was acquainted with much of that evidence, and I have read the remaining evidence in the report.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if he is familiar with amendment numbered 140 in this bill?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to ask the gentleman if the very distinguished Member of this House—a man who has had long service here—or a very distinguished Member of the body at the other end of the Capitol were to consult any lawyer, no matter how reputable he may be, with relation to his enrollment or the enrollment of some member of his family in the Five Civilized Tribes, would not this amendment make the attorney liable to a punishment of a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for not exceeding six months?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. It seems it would.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yet there are gentlemen on the floor here who are in favor of that amendment.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I will say, realizing that situation from past experience, that is what has driven me to the same conclusion as that entertained by the gentleman who has just spoken on that question—Mr. BURKE of South Dakota.

I remember, some years ago, when the Chickasaw Nation wanted to contest this Government over a proposition that they should divide with their freedmen, or ex-slaves, that the Interior Department, under Secretary Hitchcock, and all of its forces were against the Indians, and not only the Interior Department but the Attorney General's department was instructed to fight the Indians. Over the protest of the Secretary of the Interior the governor of the Chickasaw Nation—Gov. D. H. Johnston—hired an attorney, who went into the courts, fighting the Government in two of its departments, whipped them in all the courts, and reserved a judgment against the Government which it had been fighting; so that, in my opinion, in a case against the Government it would be unfair to let the Government select the Indians' attorney. If I had a suit with you, it would be absurd for me to select your attorneys; and, having gone through that experience, I realize the necessity of the Indians having the right to select their own attorneys when they have claims against the Government.

I do not think that Congress ought ever to vote to allow any man a fee. The best way is to leave it to the court, who has heard the evidence and has gone through with the case and finally decided it, to determine, because only the court in the end can decide what that lawyer earned. We can not do it.

Now, so much for the lawyers. I want to speak now of the argument made by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] about this equalization matter. Whether those attorneys get in or not, it will not shake my fealty to the Creek Indians. I will be glad to cut those attorneys out, and if this provision does not make it strong enough I will be glad that additional language should be added to do so. But I am not going to strike the Creek Indian because some one else is going to get a portion of it, however much I dislike the attorneys, or the most of them, involved. I take it, however, that the amendment is broad enough to shake them loose. As a matter of truth, I believe that Judge Allen, recently appointed an attorney, once a district judge, a very strong lawyer, resigned from the bench to accept this position upon the solicitation of the Secretary of the Interior himself, without making an application, could handle this case.

But the question, after all, resolves itself down to this proposition: Will the Government of the United States be willing to go into its own court, with all of its money and its power, to hear a claim of the red man, the Creek Indian, his ward, and combat with his ward in the United States' own court? It occurs to me that that ought to answer the entire proposition.

It is true that the Creek Council passed a resolution asking that the newborns be enrolled and that they get a portion of the property. But that was done after the passage of the Curtis Act and the treaty that was carried by that act, where it was specifically stipulated that no act of either of the legislatures of each of those Five Civilized Republics involving land should be valid until it was passed in due form by the legislature, approved by the governor, and approved by the President of the United States.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has said to you that the Indians are estopped because their representatives passed the resolution. Admitting that the governor did not sign it—and if he failed to sign it, it vitiates it, so far as its becoming valid—he says that the Indians are estopped.

I admit that the Government of the United States is not estopped, because estoppels and laches do not run against a "sovereign," and that is the only reason. But in morals the Government of the United States ought to be estopped. The Indian is the ward of the Government, and he is compelled to make a treaty to do something that he did not want to do, to wit, to abolish his own government and give up his own republic that had been in existence under a constitution and system of laws for years, and to accept a partial value of valuable town-site property and the selling of it at a reduced valuation, together with the giving up of the public roads, free of charge, to the future State government, and, in addition, compelling the Indian to divide his property with his former slaves. All those things the Creek Indian agreed to, and then to plead he is not entitled to anything in equity!

I believe that the gentleman will agree that in law the adult Creek Indian is bound to win this case, and I say he is entitled to it in equity. But whether he may be entitled to it, whether in law or equity, or both, I say it does not lie in the mouth of the Government to deny its ward the right to go into the Government's court and determine his right.

The gentleman has said that he would put in an amendment compelling these Indians to accept $800 apiece in full settlement. Yes; you may put that into the law, but it will not make it legal, and it will not make it right.

This is not a new claim. Three several committees of Congress have reported in favor of this claim in the other House, and I am not sure but what in this.

This is not a new claim, and it will continue to be a claim until it is settled. It will never be setttled until the Indians have their day in court; and all they are pleading for is the right to go in the white man's court and contest with the white man whatever legal or equitable rights they may have. I submit that the Government of the United States, in view of its past history in dealing with Indian problems, ought not to deny to its wards any right, whether legal or equitable. I am sure that there is not a citizen of this Republic who would fail to demand his rights, and under the common law he has a remedy in court for his legal and his equitable rights. The Government of the United States would claim every right it possessed against these Indians, and I trust the Government will give them the same justice and the same advantages which it would demand for itself, since the Government is the guardian of these Indians.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman believe the Indians who have received land to the value of $1,040 should have anything in addition?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. No; I think they got all they ought to have.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then does the gentleman believe that the 2,910 newborn children who were added to the roll should have anything in addition to what they have already received?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I do not think so, and I do not think they could recover anything in the courts.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then the only question in controversy is as to these Indians to whom these certificates have been given to equalize the amount?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That is all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is your only contention?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Let me answer that in my own way. The Government has provided for an allotment, as stated by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], promising to give them, because of the breaking up of their government, land to the value of $1,040. That land was variously appraised. Some of them received $1,040, some of them received $600, some of them received $800, some of them received $900, and so forth. The Government then gave them certificates showing the amount they had received and the amount yet due up to the amount of $1,040. All I am pleading for and all they ask is the right to go into court and prove that they are entitled to make the Government pay the difference between the land they received and this $1,040, as shown by the duebills of the Government.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman knows that there is no certificate. These alleged duebills are merely memoranda.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That is all. They are not such that anybody would buy them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But, as a matter of fact, many people did buy them, and they have been assigned.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I do not think so.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, is not this true, that of the whole nation, a population of 20,000, there were only about 850 who received land of the value of $1,040?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I can not tell the exact figures.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is substantially correct.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I can not give the gentleman the figures.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, is it not true that of those 850 many got land worth $12,000 or $15,000?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. The Government valued all that land by "schedule." It placed a valuation of $6.50 an acre on the best. It made no difference what they started at, just so the ratio is the same. The land valued at $6.50 an acre was any land that was black, waxy prairie, level and tillable, or bottom land not subject to overflow. Then they had another schedule which involved overflowed bottom land or best prairie land, at $5.50; then another schedule, rocky or rough prairie land, at $3; mountain land, at 25 cents; and so on. So in selecting the Government made mistakes here and there. The fact is that two quarter sections may look alike, and yet the subsoil may be different, and the subsoil must be considered as well as the soil. But it was as near as it could be arranged. They took the land according to their judgment. The man who understood land got the good land. I will tell you the truth about it. The negro got the best, because he is the best judge of land of any race in the world, and the real full blood got the poorest land. The negro knew where the good land was. He has an intuitive knowledge of land. That is the truth about the matter.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. One further question. Is not this true: If these newborn children had not been allotted, some of these Indians would have received $200 or $400 or $500; but by reason of the fact that the children were allotted they had allotments to as many as four or five members of their families, which they would not have had except for this legislation?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes; but the land belongs to the children.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And if a child dies, it goes to the parents?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. When a child lives and becomes of age, he has a place to live on. It is also true that many men without additional children or without any children at all lost by reason of these children; but in their generosity they had rather lose and give this younger generation an opportunity. I would agree with the gentleman but for the fact that 5,000 negroes, their ex-slaves, were permitted also to divide with them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. As a matter of act, were they not included by the act of the Creek Nation itself? Did not the members of the Creek Nation ask that their ex-slaves be included?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I think not, originally.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have never heard anything to the contrary.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. They did at the final allotment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Why? Because those negroes were members of the legislature and had the political power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I ask that I may proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. It is true that in 1866, after the Civil War, the Creeks did not have the stamina to combat the Government that the Chickasaws had. In 1866 the Government had a dream that they could amalgamate the Indian and the negro. Under the pressure of the Government the Creeks yielded. The Chickasaws never yielded. We are astonished they did not yield like the Creeks. The Government held over them a reward of $300, and said, "When you adopt the negro we will give you this money, and will give the negro 40 acres." They gave the Creek and negro an equal amount. The Chickasaws said no, and continued to say no; they never let him become a citizen, never let him have anything, gave him no power, and at last the United States, in desperation, forced him to divide and compelled the Indian to agree to let him have 40 acres and contest in the court. The Government did not want a contest in the court, and the Chickasaws went into court and beat the Government, and that is the only Indian tribe steadfast enough to stand up and fight the Government.

With regard to the Creeks who yielded to that great pressure—we are not surprised that they did—after forcing them to divide with the ex-slaves, I say it does not lie in the mouth of this Government, or any representative of the American people, to say to the wards of this Government that you shall not have the right to go into the courts of your country and get your legal, equitable rights [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to disagree to Senate amendments 131 and 137.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that Senate amendments 131 and 137 were taken up together, without disposing of intervening numbers. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment No. 132.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that Senate amendments 133 to 140, inclusive, be disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendments 132 to 140, inclusive.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Except amendments 137 and 139, which have been already acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendments 132 to 140, inclusive, with the exception of amendments 137 and 139, which have been acted upon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read Senate amendment 141, as follows:

For the salaries and expenses of not to exceed six oil and gas inspectors, in addition to those now employed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to supervise oil and gas mining operations on allotted lands leased by members of the Five Civilized Tribes from which restrictions have not been removed, and to conduct investigations with a view to the prevention of waste, $25,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to disagree to Senate amendment No. 141.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard for a moment upon that. This amendment is to appropriate $25,000 for oil and gas inspectors, to supervise oil and gas mining operations on lands of the Five Civilized Tribes. We have inserted in the sundry civil bill a provision for oil and gas inspectors under the Bureau of Mines and Mining. The Bureau of Mines and Mining is under the Interior Department. The activity of Dr. Holmes, the head of that bureau, passes all understanding, unless you have been familiar with him. Not desiring to take the chance in one appropriation bill, he secures an item in the sundry civil bill in the House, and then slips over to the Senate and secures another item in the Indian appropriation bill. I call this to the attention of the conferees, because while I suppose Dr. Holmes would not seriously expect to get both items enacted into law, yet I think he would not refuse if it were handed to him on a silver platter. Having secured the item in the House in the sundry civil bill, I think it would be fairly wise and proper for the conferees on the Indian bill to let this go out when it gets to conference and stay out.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will say that there was no estimate for this item, and we know nothing about it.

Mr. MANN. That makes no difference to the head of the Bureau of Mines and Mining. If there was a third place to get an item in he would put it in there.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to disagree to Senate amendment No. 141.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendment No. 142.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendment No. 142. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendment No. 143.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have so many of these items which learned and, I trust, responsible attorneys dig up out of the bowels of the earth and the archives of the past that once in a while it may be proper to call attention to them. I do not know about the merits of this claim of the Ponca Tribe of Indians residing in Oklahoma and Nebraska.

Mr. GARNER. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. It has occurred to me and other Members of the House who do not take particular interest in the Indian appropriation bill, not being familiar with the subject, that there is getting to be more legislation on the Indian appropriation bill than on all the other appropriation bills put together. How does the gentleman account for that, and is there any good reason for it? Why should not the legislation in regard to the Indians take the same course that all other legislation has to take?

Mr. MANN. I think there is a sufficient reason for it. I will not say a good reason for it. There are more outside attorneys working on claims in connection with the Indians than anywhere else, I guess. Wherever we have made a contract with the Indians in the past it has been more or less loosely drawn, whether it was a contract or a treaty. If it works against the United States, the Indian always gets the benefit of it, and nobody makes any claim against the Indian. But if some attorney somewhere can find a method of construing language so as to give the Indian a claim against the United States he gets in full operation at once. He is not very successful in getting legislation enacted by Congress by special bills. He usually is not very successful in getting items inserted in the House in the Indian appropriation bill—probably for two reasons.

The first reason is that such items are subject to a point of order and the second is the Committee on Indian Affairs. So he hies himself to the approximate location of some distinguished Member of another body, or his clerk—and it is more apt to be his clerk—and in the course of time, through persuasive means of various sorts, he gets somebody interested in the claim. Then it is introduced as an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill in the Senate, and is agreed to, and he trusts to the liberality or the knowledge of the conferees on the part of the House. Here are 168 amendments. I forced—if that term may be used, and it is not quite correct—the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs to say that they did not know anything about these amendments, or most of them, so that when it goes to conference it becomes a trading proposition. Those attorneys who are the most insistent or whose friends are the most persistent keep their items in the bill, without regard to the merits of the proposition. That is the way it has been in the past. That is one reason why for the first time since the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] has been a Member of this House we are now considering in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union Senate amendments to one of the great appropriation bills; and even that does not do very much good, because no matter how bad the amendments may be, we can not get to a vote on the proposition, because the committee at once moves to disagree to the amendments. The only amendment which we have agreed to in this committee was in respect to some typographical error, in reference to a date of a former act, and I think we did agree to one a few moments ago, because of certain conditions and influences which I will not mention.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Does not the gentleman think that as a policy of the Government it would be better for the Government to select an attorney for the Indians and pay him a stipulated salary, than to permit, as the guardian of the Indian, their funds to be depleted by excessive fees, which have in the past been paid to attorneys?

Mr. MANN. Of course, I am opposed to the payment of these excessive fees to attorneys, although I do not think it would do any great good for the Government to select the attorney for the Indians in the first place, for the reason that after he has settled the matter some other attorney would come in and say, "Here was an attorney who was selected by the Government to betray the interest of the Indians, and we still have the claim."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], that in some of the cases where the very largest fees were paid to outside attorneys the tribe had a firm of attorneys in its employ looking after their affairs in most instances. The fact that they have an attorney does not preclude these outside attorneys from getting in.

Mr. CULLOP. But the Government ought to take supervision of the matter. If the fees which have been mentioned here on the floor of the House in the discussion of these matters from time to time have been paid, then they have been unconscionable, and it is a case of the Government permitting the funds or property of its wards to be diverted into the hands of strangers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] how much is involved in this claim of the Ponca Tribe of Indians residing in Oklahoma and Nebraska?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It has not been before our committee, and it would be impossible to state what they expect to recover.

Mr. MANN. Then, may I ask my distinguished friend from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] how much is involved in this?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. The Ponca Indians are a small band of Indians——

Mr. MANN. Oh, how much is involved in this claim?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I will state to the gentleman that I never read that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Very well. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] know how much is involved?

Mr. FERRIS. I never heard of the amendment before or read it.

Mr. MANN. Or the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER]?

Mr. CARTER. The only information that I have about this matter is some letters that I have received asking that it be stricken out, since it has been placed in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that show how this thing goes. Nobody knows whether this amendment will be agreed to in conference; nobody knows how much is involved; nobody knows how much attorneys' fees may be allowed, although the amendment carefully provides that if any claim is allowed the attorneys' fees shall be paid out of the fund found due to the Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not care for any more time.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have had no opportunity whatever to learn anything about this amendment, but if I were on a conference committee and this amendment came in, I certainly would know how much was involved, how much attorneys' fees were expected, and what justification there was for the amendment, before I should ever agree to it. And I want to say I would not object at all to having that amendment stricken out here now.

Mr. MANN. Of course the only way is to disagree to it. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, if he will pardon me——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. MANN (continuing). If he gets the information such as is suggested concerning all these amendments, why we will not have passed the Indian appropriation bill within 30 days from now. It certainly will take, I will not say an ordinary person, but I will say a very intelligent person, 30 days to ascertain in regard to all the various amendments which have been inserted in this bill, and he will have to be very diligent at that.

Mr. CARTER. I want to say I am more or less familiar with a great many of the amendments, and those I do not get satisfactory information about I certainly will not be likely to agree to if I should be on the conference committee.

Mr. MANN. Well, I tried to find some amendment with which some gentleman was familiar, but I have not found one yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to disagree to Senate amendment 143.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendments 144 down to 160, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendments 144 to 160, inclusive. Is there objection?

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman except 145?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman wish 145 excepted?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. And I would like to have 146 excepted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I will except amendments numbered 145 and 146.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to disagree to Senate amendments numbered 144 to 160, inclusive, except amendments numbered 145 and 146. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And I move to disagree to amendments 145 and 146. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, amendment numbered 145 proposes to appropriate $15,000 to build an extension to the present assembly hall at the Chemawa Indian School, near Salem, Oreg. This school has over 600 pupils and is doing very excellent work, both in the mental training of the school children and in giving them industrial training. The assembly hall was authorized some years ago, and since that time numbers of students have been added to the total roll and the assembly hall is much too small to accommodate the school population. I visited the school when the hall was in process of construction. It is a very well-built hall and there is as much room provided in it as the appropriation would allow and at the same time provide for the construction of an efficient and well-built building. It served the purpose for awhile, but in the last few years it has been impossible to accommodate the school population within the assembly hall.

The training in the assembly hall is very important to the children. It gives a training that is very valuable to them. This appropriation of $15,000 will build an addition to the building on the east side, as I remember, which will provide proper accommodations for the children within the school and give a little room for those from the outside in the neighborhood of the school who attend the exercises that are offered by the school, and it is a very good thing for the Indian children that the white people from the outside associate with them in these exercises. It gives them confidence, and it gives them a training of association with white people that is very valuable to them, as has been proven in the past.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Of course the gentleman is familiar with the language of this part of the bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It says: "Additions to buildings and improvements, $12,000." Now, that was the estimate made by the department.

Mr. HAWLEY. The department also submitted this estimate for $15,000 for this special addition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that I have been at this school, and I believe it is one of the best Indian schools we have. The buildings are comparatively new, and especially that hall. It is a brick building, well appointed, although it is rather small. And I see here they have for general repairs and additions to the buildings, $12,000. Now, why do they make a distinction between all the rest of the buildings and the assembly hall? They want $15,000 additional for the assembly hall. It is on the campus.

Mr. HAWLEY. There are a number of buildings on the campus, as the gentleman knows, as he did the school the honor of visiting it recently, but several of them are wooden buildings. They are constantly in need of repairs, and there will be some additions to these buildings, which are now used for school purposes, to accommodate the growing school, and $12,000 will only take care of the needed repairs and the extensions to the buildings outside of the assembly building; and to build an addition to the assembly building sufficiently large to accommodate the school population will require $15,000. It has been very carefully looked into and estimated for, and the estimate was submitted to the gentleman's committee in the regular Treasury estimates.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I assure the gentleman that we will give the matter thorough consideration when it comes before us.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the conference committee will see its way clear to make this appropriation for a very much needed improvement for an excellent and efficient school. I have known the school and its work intimately for many years, and the work it has done and is doing is to be highly commended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to disagree to Senate amendment No. 145.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that we disagree to Senate amendment No. 146 and waive the reading of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to waive the reading of Senate amendment No. 146. Is there objection?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some time on Senate amendment No. 146.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. SINNOTT. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that there are other amendments of similar import to 146, relating to other States, and the committee desires at this time a disagreement on these amendments. However, I would like to address my remarks, for the benefit of the conferees, to this amendment No. 146, pertaining to the Warm Springs Indians. This amendment proposes to make a loan of $100,000 for the benefit of these Indians, to enable them to purchase live stock, farming implements, and so forth. The trust patents of these Indians will expire within six years, and then they will be thrown upon their own resources. They were granted a reservation consisting of about 460,000 acres, but I do not believe that within the entire State of Oregon you can find poorer and rougher land, and land less adapted to agriculture, than is to be found upon this 460,000-acre tract. I believe the tract contains only 70,000 acres of agricultural land. The balance of the reservation consists almost wholly of grazing land. The Indians at the present time have only about 500 or 600 head of cattle, and the object of this amendment is to purchase cattle for them, so that when their trust patent expires in six years they will be self-supporting by virtue of the stock that they can raise and run upon the reservation.

I may add that the Warm Springs Indians have always been friends of the whites. They have never been at war; they have always been tractable Indians. In fact, it was largely on account of the assistance and help which the Warm Springs Indians rendered to the whites during the Modoc War that the war was brought to its successful conclusion. Therefore, I think that these Indians are deserving of the highest consideration at the hands of the Government, and I trust that the conferees will take their history and their condition into consideration when this bill goes to conference.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that these Indians have never been in armed conflict with the white people?

Mr. SINNOTT. I said that.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the reason why they are poor, is it not?

Mr. SINNOTT. It may be that that is the reason, but it also is a reason why justice and reparation should now be given them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand the gentleman from Oregon to say that the trust period expires in six years?

Mr. SINNOTT. It will expire in 1921, I believe.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, if we loan money to Indians for three or four years after the trust period has expired, and after they are fully citizens and in possession of everything they have in their own right, without any interest, does not the gentleman think it will embarrass him somewhat in his district if he does not provide to loan money to the white farmers and people up there?

Mr. SINNOTT. I am ready to advance that at the proper time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Oh, the gentleman is willing, after this proposition is adopted, to extend it then to the white people in his district?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is another matter that comes up under the rural credits bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not think this will be popular.

Mr. SINNOTT. I desire to have read the hearings on this subject before the House committee, which are as follows:

Mr. MERITT. The next item reads:

"There is hereby appropriated the sum of $100,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to use this money, or so much thereof as may be necessary, under such regulations as he may prescribe, for the promotion of civilization and self-support among the Indians residing and having tribal rights on the Warm Springs Reservation, Oreg., the said sum to be expended in the purchase of live stock, seed, vehicles, harness, machinery, tools, implements, and other agricultural equipment; for the construction of houses for said Indians, and for such other purposes as the Secretary of the Interior may deem proper in promoting their civilization and self-support: Provided, That said sum shall be expended under conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for its repayment to the United States on or before June 30, 1925; and all repayments to this fund made on or before June 30, 1924, are hereby reappropriated for the same purpose as the original fund, and the entire fund, including such repayments, shall remain available until June 30, 1924; and all repayments to the fund hereby created which shall be made subsequent to June 30, 1924, shall be covered into the Treasury and shall not be withdrawn or applied, except in consequence of a subsequent appropriation made by law."

Mr. CARTER. That is a reimbursable item, the same as the others?

Mr. MERITT. Yes, sir. We offer the following justification for this item:

Indian population	749
Acreage of reservation area	462,804
Acreage of agricultural land	71,696
Acreage of grazing land	337,360
Acreage of allotted lands	323,075
Acreage under irrigation	None.
Acreage cultivated by Indian	6,000
Irrigated	None.
Not irrigated	6,000
Live stock:
Horses	1,500
Mares	1,500
Stallions, pony	150
Cows and heifers	400
Bulls	75
Steers	Not reported.
Sheep	None.

"The Warm Springs Indians were allotted several years ago, the trust patents being dated December 31, 1896, and the 25-year trust period will expire December 31, 1921. This leaves but eight years to prepare them to assume full charge of their individual affairs, and in case of failure the period will need to be extended.

"The timber of this reservation is estimated at over 2,000,000,000 board feet, and at $1 per thousand this would make a timber valuation of over $2,000,000.

"It will be seen by the statistics that there is but a small area of agricultural land, and this is known to be of low grade, in broken and scattered bodies, and mostly where dry farming only can be done.

"This reservation has been examined to determine the irrigation possibilities, and it is found that no large bodies of land exist where reclamation projects are feasible, but that scattered tracts of a few acres each can be irrigated.

"Notwithstanding the immense future tribal resources, there are now no funds to provide the Indians with building and fencing material, with live stock, etc.; hence they are progressing very slowly, and have made but slight industrial advance since they were allotted.

"The only means of developing them industrially with any hope of putting them on a reasonably self-supporting basis within the remainder of the 25-year trust period is to stock the reservation with live stock and then develop the several homes, with a view of enabling the several Indian families to care for live stock in such numbers as will supply their needs, utilizing such scattered agricultural tracts as will contribute in part to their living.

"It is with such purpose in view that this appropriation is requested.

"This would seem to be the only way whereby the vast future resources of the tribe can be made to contribute to their development at the time it is most needed.

Statement of tribal assets and liabilities.

Unallotted lands.	Acres.	Value.
Agricultural	10,000	$50,000.00
Grazing	41,360	103,400.00
Timber	222,000	2,790,452.00
Unfit for any purpose	50,000
	323,360	2,943,852.00
Timber (board feet)	2,280,000,000	2,280,000.00
		5,223,852.00
Tribal funds in Treasury June 30, 1913 (Doc. No. 328, 63d Cong., 2d sess.)		2,853.17
		5,226,705.17

All allotments have been made under general allotment act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat., 388).

No reimbursable appropriations have been made by Congress.

Mr. CARTER. In this instance you propose to conduct the stock business on an individual basis, I assume from the statement?

Mr. MERITT. We will be able to do it either way, Mr. CARTER. The item is so worded that the Secretary and the commissioner can conduct it as a tribal proposition or as an individual proposition.

Mr. CARTER. I notice you state in your justification here that this is to "develop the several homes with a view of enabling the several Indian families to care for live stock in such numbers as will supply their needs." I assume from that it is going to be an individual proposition?

Mr. MERITT. I think it was the intention to start it off as a tribal proposition, and then as the Indians are developed up to the point where they can take care of stock they will be gradually apportioned among the Indians.

Mr. CARTER. The stock that you furnish the Indians can not be sold any more than the land, can it? Not without the consent of the department?

Mr. MERITT. No, sir.

Mr. CARTER. Of course, the quicker you establish the Indian on the basis of owning something individually, and caring for it, the better off he will be.

Mr. SELLS. We are working toward that end all the time.

Mr. MERITT. This is another one of those reimbursable items where the Indians have a vast estate, and the Government will not take any chance whatever in loaning these Indians this $100,000, because they will be able to reimburse the Government without question. They have timber valued at $2,000,000; and instead of letting the Indians drift along without making any industrial progress, if they can be permitted to have this loan of $100,000 they will soon become self-supporting. There is no question that the Government will be reimbursed for the loan. The statement in the justification for this item shows the assets and liabilities of these Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] to disagree to Senate amendment numbered 146.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next amendment is numbered 161.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I move, Mr. Chairman, that we disagree to Senate amendment 161.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee disagree to Senate amendment numbered 161.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject just discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] moves to disagree to Senate amendment 161.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment covering several propositions. One of them is to sell the merchantable timber on unallotted lands on the Bad River Indian Reservation in the State of Wisconsin, and so forth. Then if they can not sell the timber at a price that is fair, they are to be authorized to build and operate a sawmill for the purpose of manufacturing the timber.

I submit to the gentleman that the present time is not a very apt time to sell timber. I have no objection to that portion of it, whether it be agreed to or not; but to say, if you offer timber for sale now, when the market is very much depressed, and then if it be not sold that you shall immediately construct a sawmill for the purpose of manufacturing the timber is, as I think, a very doubtful proposition.

I do not know just how successful a sawmill may be up on the Menominee Indian Reservation, but I do know that the excuse given for building it turned out to be a false excuse. You were told when that sawmill was authorized that there was a large amount of timber down—blown down by storm—timber which lumber mills would not purchase at a price which was profitable. Thereupon we authorized the construction of a sawmill. It has been a good while since that sawmill has been in operation. I went up there while it was being constructed and saw the timber. The timber, for the sawing of which the sawmill was constructed, never paid for the cost of turning it into lumber, much less the making of any profit on it. There was a large amount of timber down. They cut it up into saw logs. Most of it rotted in part before they sawed it into lumber, so that it was not worth very much as lumber, and they never utilized it very satisfactorily, and it never paid the expense of operating the sawmill.

I do not know; it may be that the sawmill has been operated there profitably since then. I do not know. I know we constructed a very fine sawmill there. It may be that we ought to go into the business in several of these places in constructing sawmills. I do not say so. But the fact that you can not sell the timber now at a good price is not a good reason for constructing a sawmill, because at present the timber market is very much depressed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it also to be very bad legislation to accept such an important amendment on this appropriation bill, where it has no place?

Mr. MANN. I do; but I think there will be other amendments accepted that will be equally bad, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The action of the conferees appointed by the House will not justify the gentleman's statement, I think.

Mr. MANN. I am not making any reflections on the conferees.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the suggestion or criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] respecting the proviso authorizing the construction of a mill to manufacture this lumber, I have nothing to say. I was informed by members of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Senate that the only purpose of this proviso was to insure a better bid than otherwise might be secured if it were not for the proviso. I am, however, satisfied that this timber will be sold at a fair price, and whether the proviso goes in or goes out, there will be no mill constructed at the expense of the Indians upon this reservation.

But upon the sale of the timber, upon the other provisions of this amendment with reference to allotments, I do want to say that this should be adopted, and adopted now. The present law permits the completion of the allotments upon this reservation and the selling of this very timber in question to the present contractor, the Stearns Lumber Co.; but because it is the tail end of this reservation and some of the allotments contain practically no timber and other portions of it contain valuable timber, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior for a number of years have declined to complete the allotments as provided by law until there could be legislation such as is embodied here, that will provide that, while the lands shall be allotted, the timber upon those remaining allotments shall be sold and the proceeds divided equitably between the unallotted members of the tribe—an absolutely fair and just proposition, and one that ought to remain in the bill. And, so far as those two propositions are concerned, the completion of these allotments and the sale of the timber upon the unallotted lands, I sincerely trust that the conferees will agree. These propositions are recommended by the Secretary, recommended by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, agreed to by the Indians, and agreed to by all parties concerned.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does not the gentleman think that matters of as great importance as this would seem to be ought to be brought to the attention of the House in such a way that they can have consideration by a committee? In making the inquiry I do not wish to be understood as opposing the amendment, but am only calling attention to the policy of legislating in this way.

Mr. LENROOT. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that this very proposition is now pending before the gentleman's committee in a bill, and was pending during the last Congress and the previous Congress. Now, the difficulty with that, as the gentleman well recognizes, is the fact that only a fraction of the bills reported from any of the committees get consideration in this House. In the very nature of things it is impossible that they can receive consideration, except upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar, where the objection of one man will prevent consideration.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Having on several occasions been on conference committees, I will say that we have in some instances yielded to the Senate on amendments where the subject had been considered by a committee of the House and a favorable report had been made and the bill was upon the calendar. The point I am making is that when we consider these matters in conference for the first time we do not have the opportunity to scrutinize and become informed as we ought on matters as important as this appears to be.

Mr. LENROOT. That is probably true, although this matter has been before the Committee on Indian Affairs for a number of years. It passed the Senate at one time, in a bill introduced by Senator Gamble, but died in the House committee. I think that was in the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask for a vote on the motion to disagree to amendment 161.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that amendments 162 to 168, inclusive, which are all the remaining amendments, be disagreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to say a word upon amendment 162.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I will except No. 162.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to disagree to all the remaining amendments in the bill except No. 162. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now I move to disagree to Senate amendment No. 162.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, just a word with reference to amendment No. 162, which provides for an investigation of the rights of the so-called St. Croix Chippewa Indians. A few moments ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made some observations with reference to a tribe of Indians in Oklahoma, and I am in full sympathy with the observations that he made. I wish to say with reference to this amendment that there is no attorney in connection with any rights that these Indians may have. No attorney has been employed and, so far as I know and so far as my influence goes, none will be employed. I have three reservations in my district, and in councils held in all of them I have repeatedly discouraged the employment of attorneys for any purpose so far as legislation is concerned.

But here are three or four hundred Indians, most of them belonging to Minnesota bands, a number of them receiving annuities as such, upon the rolls to-day as belonging to various tribes in Minnesota. But in legislation providing for allotting different Indian reservations in Minnesota in years gone by, in each case the right of allotment was restricted to those Indians then residing in the State of Minnesota, and so these Indians residing in Wisconsin, although belonging to Minnesota bands, never were permitted to receive any benefit from these Minnesota allotments. Investigations have been made by various Indian agents, by a Senate committee, and by various commissioners, and they have all reported that something should be done for these St. Croix Indians, and it has always stopped at that.

I took up the matter with the present commissioner, and he recommended this legislation as a beginning, that we should find out how many there are and to what tribes they belong, as a basis for future action. He also recommended an appropriation of $25,000 to relieve their present distress. So this entire matter, like the previous ones, instead of coming from any attorney, comes with the recommendation of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman inform us as to the approximate number of these Indians?

Mr. LENROOT. Between 300 and 400.

Mr. MILLER. Do they have land of their own or are they trespassers?

Mr. LENROOT. Mere trespassers, scattered along the river.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the various amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12579, the Indian appropriation bill, and had instructed him to report the same back with the recommendation that Senate amendments numbered 6 and 13 be agreed to, and that the remainder of the amendments be disagreed to.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MANN. I was going to offer a motion to recommit, but the previous question has been demanded, and I will offer it after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, is not the first thing for the Speaker to ask if a separate vote is demanded on any amendment?

The SPEAKER. The universal practice is for the chairman to make a motion for the previous question, if he gets at it in a reasonable time.

Mr. MANN. I think the motion is in order.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered, then the Chair puts the query as to whether a separate vote is demanded. If no one moves the previous question, the Speaker makes the inquiry. The question is on the previous question demanded by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit Senate amendments and the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to recommit the Senate amendments and the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and on that the gentleman from Texas demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recommit the bill with the Senate amendments to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire a separate vote on amendments 139 and 140, and I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken on these two amendments together.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the matters are entirely foreign to each other, and I object to the two being taken together.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Inasmuch as there may be a division on this, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the vote be taken on the other amendments.

The SPEAKER. The committee recommended that Senate amendments 6 and 13 be agreed to, and that all the rest of the amendments be disagreed to. The gentleman from Mississippi has demanded a separate vote on amendments 139 and 140. Without objection, all the other amendments with the exception of Nos. 139 and 140 will be disagreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The previous question having been ordered, if the House should now adjourn, would this matter come before the House to-morrow morning as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that it is not advisable to have a division to-night, and that he move that the House adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 10, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 10, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Speak to us, Father, that we may move forward, keeping step to the rhythm of faith, confidence, in the overruling of Thy providence. We realize we are not bound to succeed, but we are bound to do the best we can, leaving the results to Thee, who doeth all things well. Thou art ever the inspiration of those who seek to do Thy commands.

Comfort the sorrowing, deal gently with the erring, strengthen the weak, encourage the faint-hearted, and bring us all into harmony with the great eternal plan. Be very near to the Members of this House who have been under the surgeon's knife; touch them with Thy healing hand, and restore them to health and usefulness, and all praise shall be Thine, in the name of Him who taught us faith, hope, love. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second times and, with the accompanying report (No. 941), ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves all points of order on the bill.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD an article appearing in the current number of the North American Review, by CHAMP CLARK, entitled "A Perennial National Problem," which refers to the Mississippi River. In these days of ignorance and indifference in and out of Congress about this proposition I submit that this very timely article should be put into the hands of Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the article referred to on the subject of Mississippi River improvements. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, regretting that we can not hear the Speaker deliver his remarks in person, I shall not object.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that previous to making this request I secured the permission of the editor of the North American Review to use this article in this way. I will also state that I had not previously consulted the author of the article.

Mr. MANN. Who is the editor of the North American Review?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. George Harvey.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want to insert an article that Mr. George Harvey wrote recently about the administration? [Laughter.]

Mr. DUPRÉ. No; I am quite content to insert what I want to insert now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill, on which the previous question has been ordered. All amendments have been disposed of except amendments 139 and 140.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the vote is whether or not the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall stand as to its disagreement to Senate amendments. The question I desire to ask the Speaker is whether or not a negative vote will be equivalent to concurrence in those two Senate amendments?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, the vote comes on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to disagree to the Senate amendments, does it not?

The SPEAKER. It comes on the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes; and the gentleman from Texas had moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Notwithstanding the fact that the previous question has been ordered, is it now in order for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to move to concur in the Senate amendments as a motion which takes precedence and is privileged?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that under the peculiar situation in which we find ourselves a motion to concur would be in order. The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is equivalent to a motion to disagree to the Senate amendments. If that is true, then a motion to concur would be in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the question first come upon the recommendation of the committee and after that has been disposed of then the House can do whatever else it desires?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman from New York was in the Hall late yesterday afternoon, but here is what happened. The gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported the bill back and stated that he was directed by the committee to concur in Senate amendments Nos. 6 and 13 and to disagree to all of the rest of the Senate amendments. All of that report was agreed to except that the gentleman from Mississippi demanded a separate vote on amendments 139 and 140.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is before the House is the report of the committee, and the question is on agreeing to the committee recommendation.

The SPEAKER. The matter that is before the House is that part of the report of the committee as to Senate amendments 139 and 140, and the recommendation of the committee is that those two be disagreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the House disagree to them, that settles it. If it refuses to disagree, then the entire question is opened up again for any other motion that may be in order. For instance, I call the Chair's attention to the fact that the previous question having been ordered on the report, a motion to concur would cut out what would be properly in order if the recommendation to disagree were voted down, and that would be a motion to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the previous question operates to prevent the motion to concur, it would still be in operation if the House should vote down the recommendation of the committee, and that would be to say that the House would not have the power to do anything except to agree to the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if the previous question is ordered on the recommendation of the committee, after the recommendation is disposed of, and if the committee recommendation be not agreed to, then the Senate amendment is before the House for such other action as may properly be taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is through, I will say that I do not think that the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is any different from the recommendation of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The recommendation of the Committee on Indian Affairs was that the House disagree to all of the Senate amendments, but no one pretends that that motion has to be put first on disagreeing. The motion to concur takes priority and can not be shut off.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That action has been passed upon by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. That is true, but——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, as a matter of fact, the preferential motion is not to concur at this stage of the proceedings. It is to amend.

Mr. MANN. Suppose that this were not a Union Calendar bill but that it was a House Calendar bill, and the committee had recommended a disagreement in the Senate amendment, that would not take priority of a motion to concur, nor could you cut out the right to move to concur by the gentleman who makes the motion to disagree demanding the previous question in the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That situation could not arise, because it is only Senate amendments that require consideration. If originating in the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that can come before the House with a recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. If this were an amendment that did not require consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it would not have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs at all. It would have been taken up in the House without any recommendation from the Committee on Indian Affairs. The existing situation can not arise as to such amendments.

Mr. MANN. You can not cut out the right with a motion to concur.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not necessary. The House can agree to the report of the committee. The report of the committee is to disagree to this Senate amendment. If the House concurs in that recommendation, that settles the matter for the present. If the House does not concur in the Senate amendment, it will still be before the House to concur with an amendment, which would be a preferential motion, the stage of disagreement not having been reached, or to concur without amendment. It occurs to me that if the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has made a report, the House must first act upon the recommendation.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has made a recommendation can not cut out the right to make a preferential motion. Suppose the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] had moved, as he had a right to move, the previous question on all of the Senate amendments to final vote, and then the House should vote down the motion to disagree, under the contention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] the House could not entertain a motion to concur or concur with an amendment. The right to make the motion to concur is preferential over every other motion which can be made, or to concur with an amendment, at this stage of the proceedings. I do not think, with the previous question operating, we can move to concur with an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The motion to concur is not a preferential motion at this time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is a preferential motion over the motion to disagree.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg to differ with the gentleman. The stage of disagreement not having been reached, the recommendation of the committee is that the House disagree, and the House should dispose of that report. If it agree to the report, that ends the matter. If it does not agree to it, then the Senate amendment is before the House, and a motion to amend or to concur with an amendment is a preferential motion at that time over the motion to concur.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from New York is correct in assuming that the motion to disagree at this stage of the proceeding takes precedence over a motion to concur, the balance of his argument is correct. But he is wrong about that. The motion to concur takes precedence over the motion to disagree at all stages of the proceedings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. At this stage of the proceedings the preferential motion is to perfect the Senate amendment by amendment. The previous question has been ordered on the amendment. Therefore the question before the House is whether the House shall agree to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], suppose this recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is voted down, then what situation does the gentleman from New York think the amendments 139 and 140 will be in?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are before the House then for action, and if the House refuses to disagree to the Senate amendment on the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it has a right to perfect the amendment by amendment; it has a right to concur in it as amended or to concur in it without amendment. The alternative of disagreeing is not concurring, because the House might desire to perfect the amendment by amendment.

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me one moment, I agree that his argument is correct at this stage of the proceedings. The bill not being in disagreement as yet between the two Houses, a motion to concur does not take precedence over a motion to recede.

Mr. MANN. But we have not reached the question of receding. It is a question of whether the motion to concur takes precedence of a motion to disagree.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I mean a motion to disagree.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to read something for information before he makes his argument? In Jefferson's Manual, on page 204, it says:

> The question respecting amendments from another House are, first, to agree.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is in committee.

Mr. MANN. No; that is in the House. There has been no action in the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But where the gentleman is mistaken in that is that the committee has acted on the question of concurring or disagreeing to this particular amendment, and it has reported back to the House a disagreement. Now, the previous question has been ordered. It is not subject to amendment. If the House refuses to disagree, that is equivalent to an agreement to the amendment, or it would be in order to move to agree, and I think the report of the committee unquestionably has precedence over the motion made by an individual Member.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman finished?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. What was the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HARRISON. The parliamentary inquiry was to this effect, in the event of a negative vote, whether that in itself was equivalent to a concurrence in these particular amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read what Jefferson said about it on page 204 of the revised Manual:

> First, to agree; second, to disagree. Either of these concludes the other necessarily, for the positive of either is exactly the equivalent to the negative of the other, and no other alternative remains. On either motion amendments to the amendment may be proposed, e. g., if it be moved to disagree, those who are for the amendment have a right to propose amendments and to make it as perfect as they can before the question of disagreeing is put.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion.

Mr. MANN. If the Speaker will permit me to call his attention to the note just above what the Speaker has read:

In the House of Representatives and the Senate the order of precedence of motions is as given in the parliamentary law, and the motions take precedence in that order without regard to the order in which they are moved. But a motion to amend an amendment of the other House has precedence of the motion to agree or disagree. But it has been held that when the previous question has been demanded or ordered on a motion to concur, a motion to amend is not in order.

So the previous question having been ordered, a motion to amend is not in order, but a motion to concur takes precedence.

The SPEAKER. Why, a motion to concur will be absolutely superfluous.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make a motion to concur in these two amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but the Manual says, and evidently the Manual is right, that is Jefferson's dictum.

Mr. GARNER. A vote either way on this proposition is equivalent to a concurrence.

The SPEAKER. How is that?

Mr. GARNER. If you vote to agree to the committee report, then you would not concur; but if you refuse to concur, it would be equal to an agreement to the committee report.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the motion was to concur in the recommendations of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Yes; it was practically a motion.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Now, then, you can apply no additional motions to a separate question in a recommendation than you could to the whole of the recommendation. The Chair put the question or submitted the question upon the whole recommendation and asked if there was a demand for a vote on a separate amendment. Now, if you can apply any other motion to a separate provision you can apply it to all the recommendations of the Committee of the Whole House. I take it the Chair would hold against that. Then the only question before the House would be the motion to agree in the recommendation of the committee; that is, to disagree to the Senate amendments. Then, if that is agreed to, it ends the question. On the other hand, if it is not agreed to further motions may be made. The same is true if we voted on the committee amendments en bloc. In other words, it is a distinction you can not apply to one separate from all en bloc. I think the gentleman from New York is correct about it.

The SPEAKER. The only difficulty about the thing is this: If you go back to the time when the gentleman from Texas had charge of the bill, before it got into the Committee of the Whole House, why there would be no sort of trouble, because the practice is thoroughly established that when these amendments are in a certain stage that a motion to concur with an amendment takes precedence over a motion simply to concur, and in another stage that a motion to concur takes precedence, but this is not either one of those situations. This is a report from the Committee of the Whole House, and about nine-tenths, or maybe more of it, has already been agreed to, and all that is outstanding are these two amendments. If you vote down this recommendation of the Committee of the Whole to disagree, why, that is equivalent to agreeing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think the Chair should recall that the practice differentiates this case from what would happen if a bill were considered by the House. Suppose a bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation or an unfavorable recommendation and the House disagrees to the report. That bill takes its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Of course it does.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, the Committee of the Whole House makes a certain report to the House. The question that has to be determined by the House, the previous question having been ordered, is whether it will acquiesce in that report or reject the report. It seems to me that is the question to be determined first. After that is determined the question of what is to be done afterwards must be determined later. That is, whether the bill is still before the House for further action, upon proper motion, or whether it goes back into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further recommendation.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair hear me for a minute?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. When the House sent this bill to the committee, it sent certain amendments with it, to get the committee's idea about each of those amendments. When they came back to the House we proceeded to act upon the recommendations of the Committee of the Whole House.

Now, we are in no different position as to those amendments from what we were in before they were sent to the Committee of the Whole. There are no disagreements as yet with the Senate as regards these two amendments.

The general principle is this: After there is a disagreement, motions to concur, which will bring the Houses nearer together, are in order over motions to amend or motions to nonconcur. Before the stage of disagreement is reached the motion to agree takes precedence, of course, over the motion to disagree, but does not take precedence over a motion to amend a Senate amendment. That is the difference between the situation before and after the stage of disagreement is reached, and the reason is clear. Until you get to a disagreement you must leave every opportunity open to each House to perfect the bill. After disagreement is reached the most important legislative step is to reconcile that disagreement. Consequently, after disagreement, that motion which brings the Houses together most rapidly takes precedence over other motions.

Now, here is a situation where a motion to disagree has constructively been made by the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and upon that is moved the previous question. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] seeks to interpose a motion of higher precedence—if I am correct in saying that it is of higher precedence. The question is this: Is the gentleman from Mississippi entitled to interpose a motion of higher precedence as against a motion of lower precedence upon which the previous question has been ordered? I maintain that it has always been decided in the House that such is the case.

For instance, I remember when a resolution was offered to lay a part of one of President Roosevelt's messages on the table on account of certain statements at which the House took umbrage. I desired to head off the moving of the previous question on that resolution. I was opposed to the resolution and sought to obtain its postponement. I offered a motion to postpone the resolution, and on that I moved the previous question. The Chair held that I had made a motion of lower precedence, to wit, a motion to postpone, and then, by the simple device of moving the previous question on that motion of lower precedence, had endeavored to transform it into a motion of higher precedence. The Chair held that my device did not take away the right of the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Tawney, to make a motion of higher precedence. Now, it seems to me that that indicates the solution of this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not only been demanded on this, but it has actually been ordered.

Mr. GARDNER. But the House may not, without action of the Committee on Rules, destroy one of its own rules, which is that at certain stages certain motions have precedence over other motions. The Chair will readily see that if the House could change its rules in that way, it might, by adopting the previous question on a motion to postpone, cut out the motion to lay on the table. Yet the Chair has often seen the motion to lay on the table given the highest precedence in the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman contend that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] or any other gentleman has the right to make a motion to concur or to concur with an amendment?

Mr. MANN. Not with an amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. Not with an amendment after the previous question is ordered, and not with an amendment at all after the stage of disagreement is reached, if the question on recession and concurrence is demanded.

The SPEAKER. What good does the previous question do?

Mr. GARDNER. The previous question cuts off the opportunity of the gentleman from Mississippi to amend the bill at this particular stage, but does not prevent him from interposing the motion to agree ahead of the pending question of disagreement.

Now, may I say a word about the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], to wit, as to what happens when a bill comes out of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with an unfavorable recommendation, in case the House negatives that unfavorable recommendation? The gentleman invited the attention of the Chair to the fact that the bill in that case stands recommitted to the Committee of the Whole. This rule is an inheritance from the old Kansas-Nebraska fight. The enacting clause of that bill was stricken out in Committee of the Whole long before the consideration of the bill was completed. Thereupon the committee rose and the House promptly disagreed with the report and passed the bill under the operation of the previous question. All this was done for the purpose of circumventing the antislavery filibuster against the Kansas-Nebraska bill. After a time this device grew into an abuse and resulted in many bills getting out of Committee of the Whole before they had been considered for amendment.

Later on this present rule was adopted, so that bills which got out of Committee of the Whole without being read for amendment would have to go back to the committee before the House could pass them. The rule does not govern a case like the present.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I think if the gentleman will consider the situation in this way he will discover that this is an exception to the general rule. For instance, under the general rule it is always in order to move to adjourn, but there are times when that motion is not in order. This is a Senate amendment, it is true, but is not this a controversy between the House and the Committee of the Whole rather than a controversy between the House and the Senate?

Mr. GARDNER. No, indeed; the House has referred each one of these Senate amendments seriatim to the Committee of the Whole, and the committee has reported seriatim.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. And then it comes back as to whether we will agree with the Committee of the Whole and not the Senate.

Mr. GARDNER. On each separate amendment of the Senate the House must act. Each of these Senate amendments was separately submitted to the committee for recommendation, and each of those amendments must be separately acted upon when it comes back, unless unanimous consent be given to act on them otherwise.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Suppose a bill, when referred to the House in Committee of the Whole, is amended when it comes back. What is your situation then? The same principle applies in this case.

Mr. GARDNER. Bills are not amended before they come back. Amendments are recommended by the committee, and the House acts on them.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. The gentleman understands that this is a question of the Committee of the Whole now and not a question with the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, just a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has had no opportunity at any time up to the present time to move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Here is a motion of the first order, which has priority over every other motion except the motion to concur. He has had no opportunity to make that motion. When the previous question was ordered it was ordered on all of the Senate amendments. I do not think that by any scheme you can cut out the right of a Member to move to concur. He has not had that right heretofore. There has been no chance for him to make the motion to concur, because he could not make that motion until that amendment came before the House. That amendment has only now come before the House. He could not yesterday move to concur in the Senate amendment, because he could not make that motion until amendment 139 was reached. The previous question was demanded and ordered before amendment No. 139 was taken up. Whether that was in order or not I do not know; but I think, in the interest of expedition of business, it is desirable to hold that the previous question may be ordered on all the Senate amendments to final passage, rather than to require that that motion shall be made separately on each amendment as it is taken up. I do not think the House by a scheme of machinery can cut out the right to offer the preferential motion. But I call the attention of the Speaker to clause 7 of Rule XXIII as to what would be the effect of disagreeing to the recommendation of the committee. The committee has reported Senate amendments 139 and 140, with the recommendation that they be disagreed to. That is an adverse report on those amendments; and the rule is that whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole with an adverse recommendation, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the committee without further action of the House; so that if we should now disagree to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole to disagree to the Senate amendment this bill would have to go back to the committee. You accomplish everything that you wish to accomplish by holding in order the motion to concur, because if that is agreed to the amendment is concurred in, and if it is disagreed to the amendment is disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman say about the previous question being ordered on the whole thing?

Mr. MANN. I say this: The previous question was ordered yesterday, on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] to order the previous question on all of these amendments.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The question of order was not raised on that motion. When that motion was made it was evident that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] could not make the preferential motion at that time, because his amendment had not been reached; and if that motion had been made and somebody had made a point of order on it, and the Chair had said that you would have to order the previous question on each amendment as it came up, the Chair would have afforded the finest chance for a filibuster that any ruling has ever furnished, because if we had to order the previous question on each of these amendments as they came up, there being 168 amendments—and there having been 200 amendments on the sundry civil bill—a minority of one-fifth in the House could keep the House here until beyond next Christmas to pass an appropriation bill; and I think the Speaker would be justified in holding that the motion for the previous question could be made on all the Senate amendments at once, but not in saying that it could cut out the right to make a preferential motion, as these amendments were taken up seriatim. We could have had a separate vote on every one of the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. I know; and you might stay here until Christmas, too.

Mr. MANN. Well, that separate vote was not asked for; but if you had to move the previous question on each one at the same time, then you could have two roll calls on each amendment, and that is where you would land with that ruling, unless——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The rule expressly authorizes the previous question to be ordered on an amendment or amendments.

Mr. MANN. I understand; and I did not say it was out of order; but if the motion for the previous question was in order, it was not then in order to move to concur in this Senate amendment, and you would be cutting out the right to offer a preferential motion; and the rule is fixed so that the House itself can not take away the right to offer a preferential motion, which is the motion to concur.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, while it is true as a fundamental proposition that the motion to concur takes precedence of the motion to disagree, there is a time when that motion should be made. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] had asked to take from the Speaker's table the bill making appropriations for the Indian Service, and disagree to all the Senate amendments and send the bill to conference, as he might have done, a motion to concur in certain Senate amendments would have taken precedence over a motion to disagree. But the House, in order to expedite its business, sent this bill to the Committee of the Whole with all the Senate amendments, and the Committee of the Whole took the time of the House for two days, evidently carrying out the desire of the House to expedite the business. Finally the Committee of the Whole sent the bill back to the House with recommendation that certain amendments be disagreed to.

Now, if we begin with preferential motions, where we would have been four days ago, and move to concur in every one of the Senate amendments that the Committee of the Whole House has recommended that we disagree to, we have made no progress by sending the bill to the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of Senate amendments. The intention of the rule must be that the preferential motion shall be made before a bill from another House goes to the Committee of the Whole, and that the motion now is to concur in the recommendation made by the Committee of the Whole, and that that motion has precedence.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. When could there be an opportunity to make a motion to concur before this bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, the opportunity was had in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] made the preferential motion in the Committee of the Whole, and its consideration occupied several hours.

Mr. MANN. I know; but in the House. The gentleman stated that the motion to concur ought to have been made before the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. When was there opportunity to make such a motion?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Unfortunately, a Member must choose his remedy.

Mr. MANN. He could not have had that one; that is sure.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He could have opposed sending the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; that is done automatically by the Speaker, and not done by the House. It is referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs by the Speaker under the rules of the House. When it is reported back it is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union by the Speaker and not by the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit me to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is not the trouble here a failure to remember that this proposition is a de novo proposition?

Mr. MANN. I think it is a de novo proposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If it be a de novo proposition, why does not the previous question moved by the gentleman from Texas apply to the bill and all amendments thereto, as is the case with all other propositions?

Mr. MANN. Because the previous question can not cut off a preferential motion. A motion to recommit was made after the previous question was ordered. Suppose when a Senate amendment comes before the House some gentleman moves to disagree and demands the previous question, that does not cut off the right to make a preferential motion, nor does the ordering of the previous question cut off the right.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In so far as the House is concerned, is it not a mistake to even consider Senate amendments in Committee of the Whole? It is not a Senate amendment when it goes to the Committee of the Whole, but the bill comes in de novo. The House does not recognize Senate amendments except as a matter of convenience.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. The rule specifically provides for the consideration of Senate amendments, and when this bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole it was only for the consideration of the Senate amendments. No other portion of the bill was considered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The rule provides that any Senate amendment shall be subject to a point of order when it is being considered in Committee of the Whole; if appearing originally in the House bill it would be subject to that point of order.

Mr. MANN. The rules require that it shall be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union if it involves an appropriation, and so forth, or if it were a matter in the House that would require consideration by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That is only avoided by unanimous consent, generally, and the rules require it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to one instance where a somewhat similar case was decided. But first I wish to call the attention of the Speaker to this fact: If the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports a bill, either with a favorable recommendation or with a recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out, the only question that could be submitted to the House is the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. No other motion can intervene.

Now, on May 5, 1826——

The SPEAKER. From what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Section 6271 of volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents.

On May 5, 1826, the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a message of the Senate announcing that that body adhered to its amendment to the bill to amend the judiciary system of the United States, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That a conference be asked of the Senate upon the subject matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment proposed by the Senate to the said bill.

Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, proposed a motion to agree to the Senate amendment.

The Speaker declined to receive the motion, on the ground that the question before the House was the resolution of the Committee on the Judiciary, which must first be disposed of.

The question before the House at this time is the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that the Senate amendment be disagreed to, and until that report is disposed of no other motion is in order. This precedent is the only one I have been able to find, and it comes as close to this situation as it is possible to have it. The report of the Committee on the Judiciary was in effect a report that the chairman be instructed to move that a conference be asked, and it was equivalent under the present rules to a demand to reduce that motion to writing and put it in the form of a resolution. The other motion, which is a preferential motion, was held not to be in order until the recommendation of the committee was disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman if he thinks that the case he cited is parallel to this?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not exactly parallel; but I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that while that report from the Committee on the Judiciary purports to be a resolution, it in effect is a motion reduced to writing under the rules of the House. Every motion must be reduced to writing if demanded by any Member. The report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is no different from a report from any other committee. The Committee on the Judiciary, to which the Senate amendment and message were referred, reported its recommendation. In this case the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which the Senate amendments were referred, has made its report. In both instances the report of the committee is before the House. In that case the preferential motion to recede from the amendment and agree to the same, after notice on the part of the Senate that it adhered to its amendment, was the most highly privileged motion that could be made, because it brought the Houses together and ended the disagreement, and yet it was held that that motion could not be entertained until the report of the Committee on the Judiciary had been disposed of.

In the case now before the House the stage of disagreement has not been reached. The report of the committee is before the House, and that report must be disposed of before any other motion.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. If that is sound parliamentary law to-day, it is as much as saying that the recommendation of the committee must be acted on before the question can be put as to another disposition of the subject matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What other action could be taken if the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union made a report that the enacting clause be stricken out of the bill?

Mr. GARDNER. That is different; but suppose a standing committee reports a resolution to censure a Member, does the gentleman for a moment say that the question must be on the adoption of that resolution before the question can be taken on the motion to table the whole matter?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the motion to table the matter is different. The gentleman can move to table this amendment and end the bill; because the laying of the amendment on the table under the practice of the House would carry the entire bill to the table.

Mr. GARDNER. If the ruling of 1827 is correct, it means that when a committee makes a report, their report is pending and can not be displaced by a motion of higher privilege.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The difficulty is that the gentleman does not appreciate that there is some difference in the proceeding upon the Senate amendments and upon bills ordinarily brought before the House. The Senate amendments are here. The previous question has been ordered. If the Speaker holds that the previous question is ordered on these amendments until they are finally disposed of, then it makes no difference when this amendment comes before the House, nothing can be done with it. My contention is that the previous question is ordered on the recommendation of the committee as to the disposition of the Senate amendments.

If the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] can be interposed at this point and the previous question considered ordered on the motion to concur and the motion to disagree, then the House has to determine to concur in the amendment or to disagree to the amendment, and do nothing else. It may be possible that the House desires to refuse to concur in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole and to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. To hold that the previous question is operating on the recommendation of the committee to disagree, and also operating on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi that would be interposed, to concur, would be to tie the House hand and foot and place it in a position where it can do nothing except to concur or disagree. If the House wishes to concur, it will first vote down the recommendation of the committee and the amendment will be before it, and then it can concur in it with an amendment or it can concur in it without an amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. Suppose the previous question had not been adopted at this particular stage of the proceedings; which would have preference, the motion to agree or the motion to disagree?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My contention is that the vote must first be taken upon the report made by the Committee of the Whole. That is what is before the House, and that is not amendable. The House must dispose of the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole. Suppose a bill had been reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation, would the gentleman contend that we could interpose with the motion to strike out the enacting clause?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly; you could interpose with any preferential motion, to lay it on the table or anything of the sort.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would not be in order after the previous question had been ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has charge of a great many appropriation bills, and always when they are reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union moves the previous question. For what purpose did the gentleman make that motion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To cut out further amendment and debate.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman has just stated that the House must first dispose of the committee recommendations before it can do anything else. The fact that the gentleman always moves the previous question is of itself conclusive proof that a motion to amend the bill takes precedence of the motion to pass the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The motion to amend the bill is one thing, but a motion to modify the report of the committee is a different thing. The report of the committee is that certain amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. Other amendments may be in order, or modifications of the amendments reported may be in order, without the previous question, but no modification of the report that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill do pass is in order after the previous question.

Mr. MANN. It is not the recommendation of the committee that comes before the House; it is the bill that comes before the House; and when the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports a bill it may be without any amendments, but with the recommendation that the bill do pass. The vote is not on the recommendation of the committee; it is on the bill; and without the previous question being ordered a motion to amend the bill is in order, and the gentleman knows that as well as I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I remember a decision where the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reported a bill with the recommendation that it do lie on the table, and because of the peculiar character of that report it was held that it was necessary to move that the bill lie on the table; otherwise it might be desired to discuss the recommendation, and debate would not be possible if the motion were considered as pending.

Mr. GARDNER. If the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports an appropriation bill and the gentleman from New York moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage, would the gentleman assert that it would be out of order for me to interpose a motion to lay the whole thing on the table?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has been held that that motion is in order.

Mr. GARDNER. Then it seems to me that settles it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the previous question be ordered, the motion to lay on the table is not in order.

Mr. GARDNER. That may or may not be so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I argued that question very elaborately here, and Mr. Speaker Cannon held that pending the demand for the previous question the motion to lay on the table was in order, but after the previous question had been ordered the House having determined the vote on the main question the motion to lay on the table was not in order.

Mr. GARDNER. But the gentleman has shifted his ground. He contends that the pending question is the acceptance of the report of this Committee of the Whole. He has founded his whole argument on that substructure, and when I force him to admit that I have the right to interpose a motion to lay on the table he shifts his position by saying that the motion to lay on the table is not in order if the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am simply citing what I know to be the established rule of the House, which was impressed upon my mind very distinctly, because in the extra session, when the Payne bill was under consideration, a Member on this side moved to discharge a committee and take up a resolution of inquiry. There was some discussion, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] announced that he would move to lay the resolution upon the table. I advised the Member upon this side to demand the previous question, in order to shut out that motion. After an argument lasting some time, Speaker Cannon held that if the previous question were ordered the motion to lay on the table would not be in order, because there was a distinct ruling to that effect——

Mr. GARDNER. Nobody denies that.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). But that if the previous question had only been demanded, it did not cut off the motion.

Mr. GARDNER. Nobody denies that; but the gentleman has based his whole superstructure on the supposition that the pending question must always be the report of the committee, and that a motion can not be interposed. Now, he says that if the previous question were ordered on the report of the committee, that then nothing can be interposed, and I forced him to admit that prior to the previous question being demanded a motion to lie on the table could be interposed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, the subject matter before the House now is not the amendment, but the report of the Committee of the Whole House relating to the amendment. In other words, there is before us, so to say, a motion of the Committee of the Whole relating to the disposition of this subject matter, the subject matter being the amendment. With reference to the report of the committee, touching this subject matter, the previous question has been ordered. The main question now being the disposition of the recommendation of the committee relating to this particular subject matter. It does not seem to me that after the previous question has been ordered, the motion of an individual Member relating to the amendment, and not to the recommendation of the committee, can be received, or regarded as preferential. This motion, so to say, of the Committee of the Whole should be entitled to preferential disposition, and be immediately acted upon by a vote of this body. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] suggests that if we do not agree to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole we thereby agree to the Senate amendment. But in this he is in error. We do not do anything of the sort. The House may be perfectly willing to disagree to the amendment, by agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole, but that does not mean that if the House votes down this recommendation it is therefore ready and willing to concur in the amendment. Not at all. By rejecting the recommendation of the committee, we leave ourselves in a position to deal with the amendment as we see fit. We may be willing to agree to the same, on a motion to that effect, or we may be willing to agree to it with an amendment. Hence to vote down the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole simply brings the subject matter of that recommendation before the House for our disposition. Once before the House we may direct to it any motions that are proper under our rules. It seems to me that the plain common sense of this matter is to vote upon this recommendation with relation to which the previous question has been ordered, and if in its discretion, the House shall vote down that recommendation, then we can deal with the Senate amendment as may seem best to us, by appropriate motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi—there has been so much of this—did the gentleman ask that these two amendments be considered together?

Mr. HARRISON. I asked yesterday afternoon for the two amendments to be considered together, and there was objection.

The SPEAKER. It was objected to?

Mr. HARRISON. I now renew that request that these two amendments be considered as pending and be considered together.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that amendments numbered 139 and 140 be considered together. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, for the same reason I objected yesterday afternoon I object to it again. The amendments are entirely unrelated to each other and separate matters, and ought to be voted on separately.

The SPEAKER. The situation is this: The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union [Mr. UNDERWOOD], acting for that committee, reported to the House that all of the Senate amendments to this Indian bill be disagreed to except amendments numbered 6 and 13, which should be agreed to, and which were agreed to. The rest of them were disagreed to except amendments numbered 139 and 140, on the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to have a separate vote on them. It happens in practice that nobody ever moves to adopt the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. There are two instances in which no motion is required. One is on a conference report and one is on the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but practically the motion is pending to agree to the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Ordinarily three motions could be made—that is, if this bill is in that state—a motion to disagree, a motion to concur with an amendment, and a flat motion to concur. Now, in this matter it seems to the Chair it ought to be decided in a way to give the House the best opportunity to really express its opinion. It might want to disagree, it might want to flatly concur, it might want to concur with an amendment. The previous question having been ordered on this matter, the Chair thinks that the motion to concur is not in order, and that the vote is on whether the House will adopt the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as to these two amendments—that is, to disagree to them—and the vote is on amendment numbered 139.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry for the sake of the record. The Chair has held that it is because the previous question had been adopted?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I will again make my parliamentary inquiry on the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. That is, if the negative vote fails on this disagreement whether or not that will be equivalent to a concurrence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not in this peculiar situation. If the question was simply on this amendment, then it would be.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the two amendments be reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the two amendments.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I object, Mr. Speaker. I do not object to 139 being reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 139 unless some other gentleman objects.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to make a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee tribes of Indians, of Oklahoma, entitled under existing law to share in the funds of their respective tribes, or to their lawful heirs out of any moneys belonging to said tribes in the United States Treasury or deposited in any bank or held by any official under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, said payment not to exceed, in the case of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, $100 per capita, and in the case of the Cherokees, not to exceed $15 per capita, and all said payments to be made under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That in cases where such enrolled members, or their heirs, are Indians who by reason of their degree of Indian blood belong to the restricted class, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, withhold such payments and use the same for the benefit of such restricted Indians: Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to the members of the Choctaw Nation in Oklahoma until Congress shall have determined the rights of the Mississippi Choctaws whose names do not appear upon the approved rolls of the Choctaws in Oklahoma and until such of said Mississippi Choctaws as shall be found entitled to enrollment have been placed upon the rolls of citizenship of the Choctaw Nation.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERRIS. A vote of "yea" concurs in the report of the Committee of the Whole and disagrees to the Senate amendment, and a vote of "nay" to the contrary. Am I correct in that assumption?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. And a disagreement in the Senate amendment amounts to sending the matter to conference, does it not?

The SPEAKER. No mere disagreement would send it to conference, but the probabilities are that that is where it would go. Of course it would take another motion.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my unanimous-consent request that amendment No. 140 be read in connection with amendment No. 139.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to amendment No. 140 being read until No. 139 is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota objects.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to make another unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that amendment No. 140 be considered before amendment No. 139.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that amendment No. 140 be considered before amendment No. 139. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Now, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports in favor of disagreeing to Senate amendment No. 139.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, a vote "yea" would be a vote to disagree?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. And a vote "nay" would mean not to disagree? And if the nays should be in the majority, then this matter would not be sent to conference until some other disposition was made of it?

The SPEAKER. That is the Chair's understanding. Those in favor of the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on amendment No. 139——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. In order to expedite business, however, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. What is the status of the proposition before the House? What is it the House is voting on?

The SPEAKER. The House is to vote on the part of the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union which recommended a disagreement to Senate amendment No. 139, which is the Choctaw amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is that the House disagree to amendment No. 139; and a vote "yea"——

Mr. BURNETT. Sends it back to conference?

The SPEAKER. A vote "yea" simply means a disagreement to that amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it not a disagreement to amendment No. 139?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the question.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 92, answered "present" 9, not voting 179, as follows:

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next recommendation. The vote will now be taken on the recommendation relating to Senate amendment 140.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order that the roll call be dispensed with?

The SPEAKER. You do not have to have a roll call unless it is asked for. The question is on agreeing to that portion of the report relating to Senate amendment 140.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, was the vote announced on the other proposition?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The yeas were 153, the nays 92, and those answering "present" 9. The vote now is on agreeing to that part of the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union which relates to Senate amendment numbered 140. The report is to disagree to the amendment. Those in favor of adopting that portion of the report will say "aye," those opposed will say "no."

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks for a division. Those in favor of agreeing to that portion of the report will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Ten gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Seventy-four gentlemen have arisen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 10 and the noes are 74, and the House refuses to agree to that part of the report.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I move——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference; and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the motion to concur in Senate amendment numbered 140—to agree to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] moves to agree to amendment 140.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has not the vote already been taken on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] on that question?

The SPEAKER. The vote has already been taken on that portion of the report from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, disagreeing to Senate amendment numbered 140.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not that end it?

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to agree to that part of the report.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman had made a preferential motion to concur earlier, it would have been in order?

Mr. HARRISON. The Speaker ruled that I could not make that. I have now made it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, under this rule, does not the bill go back to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I say, the House having disagreed to the adverse recommendation of the Committee of the Whole, under the rules does not the bill go back automatically to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. What becomes of the other part of the report?

Mr. MANN. The other part of the report has been disposed of. The Committee of the Whole House made an adverse report on this amendment, and the House has disagreed to that report. The rule says in these cases the bill goes back to the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman the rule there?

Mr. MANN. I think I can find it. Paragraph 853, page 378, of the new manual provides:

> Whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole with an adverse recommendation and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the said committee without further action by the House, but before the question of concurrence is submitted it is in order to entertain a motion to refer—

And so forth. This was an adverse recommendation on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think that that language applies to this kind of a situation?

Mr. MANN. I do not see why not.

The SPEAKER. Why does it?

Mr. MANN. That is what it says. The very purpose of it is that the committee may desire to amend this proposition. Amendments should be made first in Committee of the Whole. Here is a rejection of the adverse report of the Committee of the Whole by the House. I do not differentiate this situation from that of a House bill under consideration. Of course this is a Senate amendment to a House bill. It is immaterial to me——

The SPEAKER. All that the Chair wants to do is to rule so that if anything like this comes up again it will not be in a muddle.

Mr. MANN. We are operating under the previous question. The Chair has ruled that a motion to concur was not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled that the motion to concur at a particular state was not in order.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the previous question is still operating.

The SPEAKER. How does it operate after the House has voted on the proposition?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. He did.

Mr. MANN. To the final vote.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. We have not had the final vote yet.

The SPEAKER. Have we not had the final vote on that proposition?

Mr. MANN. No; certainly not.

The SPEAKER. What else could the House itself do?

Mr. MANN. The House has had a vote on the recommendation of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And has turned down the recommendation of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is true.

Mr. MANN. Now, there is nothing else the House can do; but the rule sends it back to the committee, where it is considered de novo.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think the reading of this rule clearly demonstrates that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is in error. The rule says:

Whenever a bill is reported back from the Committee of the Whole with an adverse recommendation, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the said committee without further action by the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that rule clearly refers to a bill and not an amendment to a bill. It clearly refers to a situation where the Committee of the Whole has made an adverse report on a bill, such as striking out the enacting clause, as the footnotes below demonstrate, or where it has adversely reported the whole bill. Necessarily it would go back to the Committee of the Whole, and properly so, for consideration, and the language of the rules does not say "a bill or amendment," or "a bill or resolution"; and all the rules of the House have held that where the rule says "a bill" it does not mean "a resolution." This language refers to a case where a whole bill has been adversely reported. Where the House has disagreed to such a report, then necessarily it goes back to the Committee of the Whole for consideration and amendment. But here is a bill that has been favorably reported, and most of the amendments acted on in Committee of the Whole, and with one recommendation of the Committee of the Whole adverse. It seems to me clear that the action of the committee in recommending it to the House is subject to any relevant motion that can be made when the previous question is ordered. Of course it can not be amended. If the previous question had not been ordered, it could have been amended in the House, but the previous question having been ordered, clearly it is in order for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to move that the Senate amendment be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion for the previous question expended its force when the vote was taken, and that this amendment is back in the House in the same condition that it would have been if it had never been sent to the committee, and that the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to concur in the Senate amendment is in order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have already voted to disagree on the other amendments.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Has the Senate asked for a conference?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No. I move that the House ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, H. R. 17041, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, reserving——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object. I should like to have the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] for a moment. I notice that there are two Senate amendments—Nos. 44 and 45, I think—that seek to create new customs districts under the law. We have recently rearranged all the customs districts of the United States. At the present time I know of no reason why these new districts should be created. There is one collector over a number of customhouses, and I see no reason to believe that the present system is not working effectively. I certainly do not believe that this important change should be made in an appropriation bill without careful consideration by the House committee that has the matter in charge, in consultation with the Treasury Department, and after a hearing and a report. I rose for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] if the bill goes to conference by unanimous consent, will he agree to bring those items back to the House before a final agreement is reached?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. Is one of those places Kansas City, Mo.?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I will ask the gentleman if the authorization to the President to reorganize the customs service, under which authority he discontinued the customs district of Kansas City, was not in an appropriation bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was.

Mr. RUCKER. And whether, acting under that authority carried in an appropriation bill, he did not discontinue the customs district at Kansas City?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Is it not true that Kansas City was one of the best-paying customhouses in the United States, from the standpoint of what it cost to keep it up?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It probably was. That does not have anything to do with it. The gentleman evidently does not have a conception of what this reorganization is.

Mr. RUCKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I think I have some conception of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the gentleman does not or he would not have asked the question about the receipts of the office at Kansas City. The whole system and control of the customs districts was changed under Executive order made by authority of Congress. Heretofore we have had collectors of customs in each port, small or large. That brought about a system of extravagance in expenditure. In a number of small ports we were paying men two and three thousand dollars, sometimes, as salaries when they did not collect $5. That was one reform. But, more than that, where ports were close to each other, there was no coordination of effort in making the returns, assessments, and valuations, because one collector of customs would decide on one question and another on another.

Now, one of the great purposes in making customs districts, instead of having a collector in each port, was to bring certain territory within one jurisdiction. Kansas City was put within a jurisdiction. That collector is just as much the collector of Kansas City as he is of the port where he flies his flag.

Mr. RUCKER. At St. Louis.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, the question whether the amount of business in Kansas City should require the location of headquarters at Kansas City or at St. Louis is a matter about which the gentleman may be right as to his conclusions. But as a proposition to create a new district simply because they are not the headquarters at this time, I see no reason for, because the collector is merely the director of the men under him and the subcollector at this other port is occupying the position of collector, with all the force and all the authority, except subject to the regulation of his superior officer. Heretofore the collector had to come to the Treasury Department direct from that port, but the deputy collector now goes to his superior officer in one of the 40 or 45 districts.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I believe it is a fact that for many years the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has sought to eliminate a lot of useless customhouses because of the fact, as stated by the gentleman a moment ago, that it costs about $1,000 to collect $1. There are quite a number of gentlemen here who in the discharge of their high duty seek to save people from these unnecessary expenses, but by reason of the interest of the Members in retaining every official in their State or district, that interest being combined, it was impossible to carry the reform through. For that reason the language was put in an appropriation bill authorizing the President to reorganize the service. I will ask the gentleman if it ever was contemplated at the time the language was put in the bill that the office at Kansas City should be abolished?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know what was in the mind of the Treasury Department, but I will say that it was contemplated that an entire new system should be created; that in place of each customs office standing out by itself and having hundreds of them in the United States it was contemplated that we should divide the country into customs districts where in a certain area the same class of goods imported and the same conditions prevailed, and one man could overlook them all.

To illustrate more fully—you may have an army and you may have a general commanding, and each unit commanded by a captain; or you may have an army divided into regiments and the regiments divided into companies. Now, for the purpose of perfecting the system and making uniformity of valuation, and uniformity in appraisements, they have made the collector of customs in some ports the collector of customs for the district, and subcollectors take the place of the original collector. Nothing could be accomplished by this resolution that I can see except to create a new salary for a man in Kansas City, unless it is a question of pride, and I think that figures a good deal in it.

The mistake of the whole matter was in not making the collector the "collector of district" No. 44, or No. 45—whatever the district may have been—instead of making him collector of St. Louis or collector of the port of Chicago, and bringing other ports in. There would be nothing in the pride question if they had said that the collector of St. Louis shall be collector of district 44, or whatever the number is.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, in many of the debates had heretofore on the uselessness of customhouses, does the gentleman recall that there was ever any assertion that the office at Kansas City ought to be abolished?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it was suggested that the office should be abolished. As a matter of fact, the office at Kansas City is not abolished. The office at Kansas City is just as virile and effective and doing business to-day exactly as it did before this order of President Taft was made. The only difference is that there is a subcollector who is in charge of that port, of that particular office, under the command of a man who happens to be located at St. Louis. As far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly willing to have a law passed allowing the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time to say where the flag of the collector of the district shall float and where it may be the most available for the public service, and then let Kansas City and St. Louis determine between themselves which has had the bigger collection of receipts and which was entitled to have that flag fly over it.

Mr. RUCKER. Ordinarily I am willing and content to follow the lead of the gentleman from Alabama, but this time I can not do so, because I think that if this amendment is stricken out of the bill it would perpetuate a wrong.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] that if we let these two amendments go through we will destroy the present system, which is economical. It is not only economical in the matter of salaries, it is economical because it brings uniformity of effort, it unifies valuations, and protects the customs service, and as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means I have not heard one word of protest from the Treasury Department that the Government revenues are not fully protected and that the efficiency of that office is not just as great to-day as it was before. I can assure the gentleman that while there are only two in this amendment there are forty who will be knocking at the door if we agree to the amendment. Of course some gentlemen merely want an increase in salary. That is one thing, and it is a minor consideration. The other thing is that one town does not like to say that it belongs in the other town's customs district. It was unfortunate that they should name the man the collector of the town, when he was the collector of the district.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that we Missourians did not relish the fact that the Republican President, a man for whom I entertain the highest respect, should on the eve of departing from his office, after having been defeated at the polls, destroy an institution in our State, and in that way slap the face of one of the best cities in the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that he did not destroy the customhouse, and I am sure that if the gentleman will write to the Treasury Department to-day he will get a report that the efficiency and usefulness of that customhouse is just as great as ever. They only made Kansas City in the customs service follow the flag of St. Louis, just as they made in the case of the selection of the Federal reserve cities a great many western cities bow in obeisance to the Kansas City Federal reserve bank.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, pretty soon there will be a change of offices in St. Louis and Kansas City if this bill goes through, and under the new administration the receipts will be much greater and the office will be fully as well administered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there is any question about receipts, because the subcollector at Kansas City performs the service the other man did, and is probably just as efficient. If he were made collector, he would still perform those duties, only he would get a little more salary.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have very great respect for the wisdom of the Senate in putting this amendment in the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has compared the customs organization to that of an army. I suppose that comparison would apply equally as to a volunteer army as to a regular army, and while such a thing, of course, could not happen in Missouri, I was just wondering whether or not the displacing of 40 would not work to deprive some volunteer colonels and generals of the opportunity of getting a commission?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I can not advise my friend from Tennessee upon that question. I merely rose to ask the gentleman from New York if he would not agree to bring this matter back so that the House might have an opportunity to vote upon it, in case the Senate did not recede from its amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to state that the House will have an opportunity to pass on the matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have a vote and consideration of the matter to-day on amendments 157 and 163. I think it would be better to dispose of them now, while the House is fairly well attended, than when they are brought back from conference. One is the issue of bonds for the Panama Canal, and the other is with reference to the appropriation for the Salem, Mass., fire sufferers. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he ask unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table and disagree to all of the other amendments, so that we may consider these at this time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, one of the amendments in the bill I desire to move to concur in, and that is amendment 91, on page 115. I do not wish to waive any right that I have with reference to the matter by consenting to disagreement to any or all of the Senate amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to agree that the House shall have opportunity to pass on amendment No. 91. The gentleman is not particular about making the motion to-day?

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. With this understanding, I will not press it now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am willing to agree with the gentleman that he shall have the opportunity before the bill is disposed of.

Mr. MANN. I think we had better dispose of it now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like an opportunity to look into the amendment a little.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not think the gentleman will have any trouble in sending it to conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference, except as to amendments 157 and 163, which will now be considered in the House. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask how much debate is expected to be allowed on these amendments?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I understand that on amendment 163 30 minutes will be satisfactory.

Mr. GARDNER. Fifteen minutes on a side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois want on amendment 157?

Mr. MANN. Not over five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report amendment 157.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment 157: Line 16, page 192, after the word "expended," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

"Provided, That all expenditures from the appropriations heretofore, herein, and hereafter made for the construction of the Panama Canal, including any portion of such appropriations which may be used for the construction of dry docks, repair shops, yards, docks, wharves, warehouses, storehouses, and other necessary facilities and appurtenances, for the purpose of providing coal and other materials, labor, repairs, and supplies, for the construction of office buildings and quarters, and other necessary buildings, exclusive of fortifications and colliers, and exclusive of the amount used for operating and maintaining the canal, and for the permanent organization after the canal is opened for use and operation, may be paid from or reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of the proceeds of the sale of bonds authorized in section 8 of the said act approved June 28, 1902, and section 39 of the tariff act approved August 5, 1909."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it seems a peculiar motion for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to make, that the House agree to this amendment. When the Alaska railroad bill was before the House it contained a provision for the issuance of bonds for the payment of the expenditures in connection with the construction of that road, and it was the distinguished gentleman from New York, displaying the most activity, I think, he has displayed on any bill before the House, who succeeded in striking out of the Alaska railroad bill the provision for the issuance of bonds for the construction of that road, stating to the House with due frankness that the Government would be able out of its ordinary receipts to pay the expenditures of the construction of the Alaska road and there was no necessity for the issuance of bonds. I joined with the gentleman at that time, as the majority of the Members here did, and we struck out of the Alaska bill the authority to issue bonds. Now the only thing that is asked for in this amendment, although in terms the amendment covers a good deal—the only new thing in it is the authority to issue bonds for the payment of the expenditures of building colliers in connection with the Panama Canal. All the rest of the authority to issue is in the present existing law, if I am correctly informed, and I will ask the gentleman whether there is anything new except the colliers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This excludes the colliers; this prevents bonds being issued for building colliers. That is one of the purposes of this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; this does not exclude colliers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Read it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not know what the amendment is. [Laughter.] It is not only contrary to the motion the gentleman made before, but he does not really know what it is. The purpose of this amendment is to permit the issuance of bonds to replace in the Treasury the money that is expended in building colliers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I repeat again, the purpose of this amendment, among others, is to prohibit the replenishment of the Treasury with money that is spent for the building of colliers.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman, What is the new provision in this amendment from existing law? The current sundry civil bill carries a provision authorizing the issuance of bonds for the construction of work on the Panama Canal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the current law is:

That all expenditures from the appropriations heretofore, herein, and hereafter made, etc., shall be reimbursed from the proceeds of bonds, exclusive of fortifications and exclusive of the amount used for operating the canal and for the permanent organization after the canal is open for use and operation.

Now, this amendment is:

Exclusive of fortifications and colliers and exclusive of the amount used for operating and maintaining the canal, and for the permanent organization after the canal is open for use and operation.

And then instead of requiring the Treasury to reimburse it is made discretional by the change of the word "shall" in the existing law to the word "may" in the amendment. It makes it possible, if so desired, to pay the cost of the canal out of current receipts instead of compelling the Treasury Department, regardless of the condition of the Treasury, to issue bonds to replace the money paid on that account.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman be correct—and I am not sure but he is—I am willing to apologize to him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is with me.

Mr. MANN. I am if the gentleman is correct. If the purpose of this is to exclude the issuance of bonds for colliers——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the purpose.

Mr. MANN. This amendment was in the bill as it was presented to the House and went out on a point of order. I supposed the amendment was the same; I assume it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, it is. That is my information—that it is the same.

Mr. MANN. The statement was then made—and I am not sure I examined it carefully—that it was for the purpose of allowing the issuance of bonds for this purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We had reached the point in the bill when the bill was under consideration, and the gentleman made his point of order without any explanation——

Mr. MANN. Well, that may be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the purpose is to exclude colliers and fortifications and the cost of operating and maintaining the canal and the cost of permanent organization from reimbursement from proceeds of bonds, and in addition we changed the word "shall" to the word "may," so that the Treasury Department is not under mandatory legislation to issue bonds but it is left discretionary with them.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have often found that the gentleman from New York is both acute, indefatigable, intelligent, and trustworthy——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If there is anything else, I would be glad to have it.

Mr. MANN. And I think the gentleman is correct this time, and I shall vote for the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that amendment 163 be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report Senate amendment numbered 163.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 205, after line 15, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"That for the relief of the sufferers from the recent conflagration in Salem, Mass., there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That all expenditures under this provision shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of War."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to disagree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment with the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words inserted by the Senate and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For the relief of the sufferers from the recent conflagration in Salem, Mass., $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That all expenditures under this provision shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of War."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say this: If the House is to concur in this amendment with an amendment, the country will take it as the desire of the House to make the appropriation, and we simply wish the amendment in proper form. That is a fair statement to make to the House.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I drafted that amendment at the suggestion of Mr. Courts and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] on the understanding that if the amendment is adopted it settles the whole question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That will be construed as an instruction. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] and I reserve 15 minutes in opposition, and at the end of that time I shall move the previous question.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman from New York yield permission, by unanimous consent, for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] to yield out the time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. He can do as he pleases.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall try to explain this situation just as briefly as possible, because the time is very limited. Everybody knows about the fire in Salem, Mass. I think that there is scarcely anybody in the country, outside of somebody who lives in Salem or who has been there to see the situation, who realizes the magnitude of the damage wrought by that fire. I was there during the fire and have visited the scene since, and I have communicated with people who have had to do with the arrangements for relief, and I know pretty well what the situation is. But I can give only a suggestion as to what the real conditions are.

Let me say at the start that because it was a fire it has not received the publicity that an earthquake or some other calamity of an unusual nature would get in the newspapers. As a result, the people of the country do not realize the extent of the havoc wrought, and therefore the voluntary contributions, while they have been very generous, have not come in in sufficient amounts to take care adequately of the damage done there. The governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has requested Federal aid, and the President of the United States has sent a special message asking Congress to grant such aid. The Senate has adopted the amendment in the sundry civil bill granting Federal aid, as recommended by the President; and it remains only for this House to concur in this amendment in order that Federal aid may be granted to the stricken city.

I will state that the territory burned was 254 acres in extent. There were burned eight leather factories, eight shoe factories, nine shoe-stock establishments, six machine shops, and three big foundries, besides a number of small plants. The Naumkeag Cotton Mill was the largest single plant destroyed, employing something like 2,000 hands. There were over 17,000 people driven out of their homes by the fire. The total damage has been conservatively estimated at $10,000,000.

To compare it with Chelsea, the damage done in Salem was much more disastrous, because while the conflagration in Chelsea was of great extent the factories in Chelsea were saved, while in Salem not only were the homes burned to the ground, but the factories and other places of employment were laid in ruins. Thus thousands of good, honest, and industrious people are without homes and, what is worse, without means of employment by which to earn their livelihood. Unless relief is given, and given speedily, many will be in actual need of the necessities of life—for clothing, food, and shelter. They lost practically everything, and they have no means of subsistence. Most important of all, I repeat, they have no means of getting employment with which to earn a living.

Immediately after the fire camps were established, and the people lived in tents. The State militia was sent to Salem, to the number of some 1,200 men, to take care of the tents and of the people in the tents and to protect property. At the beginning there were something like 3,500 people in these tents, but gradually the number has gone down, until there are about 2,000 or 2,500 persons living in that way in Salem to-day. In addition to that, of the 17,000 who were thrown out of their homes, there are a great many who have been taken in by friends or hospitable people living in Peabody, Lynn, and other surrounding towns, and are living there temporarily.

As a citizen of Massachusetts, I witnessed with pride the sympathetic spirit everywhere manifested, from the governor down to the humblest citizen. Everybody has joined in cooperating to give aid and relief to the stricken city and its unfortunate sufferers. It is absolutely necessary that something should be done by the Government if the people in Salem are going to get proper relief. The great problem is going to arise next winter, because the factories and the Naumkeag mills can not be built inside of six months. The State government has contributed generously, not only by direct appropriation but by the abatement of the State tax, by the expenditure for the State militia, and by the contribution of State supplies, such as beds and other equipment.

The suggestion has been made that this will establish a precedent. If you will look into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 11918, you will find a long list of precedents for this action by Congress, covering a period from 1812 down to the present time. All we ask is that this House shall do what the President has asked us to do, and what the Senate has already done. We know if men want to do so, they can talk about precedent and all that sort of thing and make a plausible argument, appropriate, perhaps, in settling a legal controversy. But this is not the time for a legal argument. Where people are in distress and suffering, we ought, without drawing fine distinctions, to give them aid unhesitatingly and ungrudgingly.

Now I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I concur very heartily in the amendment adopted by the Senate.

There was a time when a constitutional question could have been suggested in bar to the present measure. That time, however, has long since passed. Precedent after precedent for appropriations of this character, based upon general humanitarian purposes, have neutralized the arguments which might have been found valid early in the history of our Republic. The picture of disaster, of distress, of sorrow, of want, and of misery which has overtaken one of the most historic towns in one of the most historic Commonwealths of the American Union must appeal to this House.

May I suggest to the House what I hope is not an improper argument? The American Congress can never repay Massachusetts for what she has done for the American Nation. [Applause.] Massachusetts is not only a historic but a romantic Commonwealth, and in the hours of our infancy and struggle it was the genius and the courage and the self-sacrifice of that great Commonwealth that contributed as much as any single Commonwealth of the original 13 States to the establishment of free government upon these new shores. [Applause.] And therefore, Mr. Speaker, when this appeal is made to us, and when we consider appropriations of like character, made in some instances upon motives, in my humble opinion, of less merit, I shall with great pleasure cast my vote in favor of the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the sympathy of everyone goes out to the destitute and stricken people of Salem, who have lost their property and their homes in the fire which devastated that community on the 25th of June. No question of the power of Congress was raised by those who in antagonizing this appropriation opposed making the Federal Government bear the burden of the poor relief of the State of Massachusetts.

The fire occurred on the 25th day of June. Appeals were issued for subscriptions to relieve the people who were made destitute. Some 250 acres were burned, a number of industries were destroyed; 17,000 people, or about 3,000 families, it is asserted, were rendered homeless. The State of Massachusetts, by its militia, completely policed the devastated section, furnished tents and established camps for those destitute, and at the last report there were 1,800 of the supposed number of destitute persons being cared for in those camps.

A request was made that Congress should appropriate $200,000 for immediate relief, to meet the exigencies that were then pressing. Upon receipt of the request the Committee on Appropriations met at once to consider the question of aid by way of appropriation from the Federal Treasury. These facts were ascertained: Without seeking or attempting to place the mill hands and operatives in remunerative lines of employment elsewhere, it is proposed to maintain them at public charity, or at the expense of the Government of the United States, for a period of six months or longer, and until it is possible for the owners of the industries to rebuild their mills and factories and furnish the people with employment. There was no pressing necessity shown for additional money at this time. Three hundred and eighty thousand dollars had been raised by public subscription. The State of Massachusetts had not been active. It had not appropriated a dollar. Since the Committee on Appropriations has made its inquiries Massachusetts has appropriated, under the guise of poor relief, $100,000.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I will not yield at present. So that at the time the Committee on Appropriations declined to recommend an appropriation of $200,000, requested upon the theory that it was needed for the immediate necessities of the occasion, there was available $483,000 of the $1,000,000 that it is estimated will be required to care for these people during a period of at least six months, but in all probability from 8 to 10 or 12 months.

The only question involved was the question of the propriety of the Federal Government being called upon by a great, rich, prosperous State like the State of Massachusetts to take care of its destitute people because of any disaster, because of any catastrophe——

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because of any situation that was not at that time beyond the control and the ability of the local and State authorities to control.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I prefer not to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What has Congress done and declined to do in similar situations? What has been the policy of the Government? Two years ago the towns of Austin and Costello, in the State of Pennsylvania, numbering 3,500 people, were the victims of a flood resulting from the bursting of a dam. Practically all of the houses in the towns were wiped out. All of the industries were destroyed. Seventy-seven persons lost their lives. Three million dollars' worth of property was destroyed. Yet Congress, because it is not part of the functions of the Federal Government to take care of destitute persons, declined to appropriate for the relief of those impoverished by the disaster. During this last winter, when the floods in the Brazos River, in Texas, swept a vast territory, destroying $15,000,000 worth of property, a request was made to appropriate money to buy seed to plant corn, and Congress declined to extend such relief.

In the Briceville, Tenn., mine disaster, where a large number of persons lost their lives and others were rendered homeless and dependent, Congress declined relief. In the Black River floods in Wisconsin, where a community was wiped out and the homeless people were dependent upon the charity of the State and of the good people of the State and of the country in general, Congress declined to do anything. When Galveston was swept by flood and Johnstown suffered in the awful disaster that shocked the country it was not suggested that the Federal Government should aid with money.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that San Francisco furnishes a parallel case and a precedent. There is no parallel. The earthquake shook San Francisco and was followed by fire. The fire was raging a day when the news reached the country of the appalling character of that catastrophe. Forty per cent of the people of California were involved. The entire food supply was wiped out. Thirty-four hundred acres of the city were swept by fire, which lasted for three days. The legislature of the State was convened and authorized the governor to declare public holidays, and public holidays were declared, running over a period of three months, so as to prevent negotiable paper being presented and becoming due. The entire population was dependent for its very existence upon the rations furnished by the Federal Government. The State and local authorities were utterly unable to cope with the situation; were unable even to police the city and furnish protection to life and property, so that Federal troops were furnished for such purposes, and nearly six months were required to remove the débris resulting from the earthquake and fire so that the people might begin the work of rehabilitation.

It is said that Salem and San Francisco furnish parallel situations. I deny it. There is no comparison between them. When the floods occurred last year in the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers Congress did what it has done and I believe always will do—cooperated with the State authorities by utilizing all the facilities of the Government to prevent the destruction of human life during the emergency. But we declined to recommend $2,000,000 to rehabilitate the people of Dayton, to replace their household effects, to furnish subsistence, and reestablish them in housekeeping, just as it is proposed to do here. Everyone realized that such action could not be defended from any viewpoint. If Congress initiates this policy, then whenever there be a flood in the Mississippi and the great Yazoo Delta is overflowed, whenever fire or other disaster or catastrophe afflicts any of the people of the United States, we may expect the State governments and localities to come to the Federal Treasury as the easiest place to get money to care for the destitute and the helpless and those deserving of charity. Instead of the States and localities doing such work, for which they are organized, we shall continually have appeals of this character. Such demands constantly grow. They are subversive of our whole scheme of government. The Federal Government should not be asked to do such things, and we should refuse to do them. It is neither pleasant nor easy to resist the appeals that have been made by those pressing for this appropriation, and still the appeals are neither so meritorious nor so persuasive as many others neglected by the Congress. I have in the discharge of my duties as head of the Committee on Appropriations resisted to the best of my ability the efforts to place burdens upon the Federal Treasury which do not belong to it. I know that the support and cooperation to which I am entitled has not always been extended to me. States, localities, and individuals successfully unload many obligations upon the Federal Treasury. Some one must attempt to stop these raids.

Believing, Mr. Speaker, under existing conditions, that an appropriation from the Federal Treasury for the relief of the Salem sufferers is contrary to sound public policy and can not be justified on any ground whatever, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

How much time have I used, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used nine minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PHELAN. I yield three minutes to my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of this House for a little over two months, and I had resolved to wait until some of my newness had worn off before asking for the attention of the House. But when the immediate welfare of 17,000 men, women, and children in the old city of Salem, Mass., is at stake I cast all resolutions to the winds and I rise to urge this House to agree to this amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. FITZGERALD] has not told this House that the matter of Federal aid to Salem originated here in Washington. On the night of this great disaster the President of the United States wired to our governor, asking him what aid the Federal Government could give in the hour of distress. Our splendid governor, the Hon. David I. Walsh, waiting to realize just how great the disaster was, hesitated before calling for aid from the powers here in Washington.

When Gov. Walsh at last asked that the President lend his assistance a message came to Congress recommending an appropriation of $200,000, and another branch of Congress has unanimously answered that message by the passage of this amendment. I know that some of the watchdogs of the Treasury have been working overtime trying to defeat this proposition; but, Mr. Speaker, precedents, almost without number, are here cited to you to show that it is no new action for Congress to take in matters of this nature. What our President has asked for in his plea for a devastated city should, in my judgment, be granted immediately. Mr. Speaker, I love to recall that whenever other sections have called on Massachusetts for aid she has never failed to respond according to the demands. Throughout the length and breadth of the Nation the prompt and patriotic philanthropy of the old Bay State is known and appreciated, and Massachusetts at this time, and without delay, has responded to the appeal from one of her own cities—to one that has suffered a blow peculiarly heavy and appealing.

Thousands have lost their homes and employment simultaneously, and there is no neighboring city or town around Salem where the 17,000 people who have been stricken by this calamity can now locate and the breadwinners among that number find employment.

Thousands of families must be sheltered, fed, cared for, and aided in every possible way until gradually they are placed beyond the need of aid. It will take time and it will take money, and as a Representative of a Boston district I have a right to ask this House to lend us that aid.

Mr. Speaker, Boston has always led the way in extending relief in such catastrophes. It was Boston that sent the first carload of supplies to stricken San Francisco; it was Boston that first heard the cry of help from the cities and towns along the river when the Mississippi overflowed its banks, and it was Boston again that led the way in affording succor to quake-rocked Messina.

Mr. Speaker, when I hear economy suggested at such times I like to read the words of the junior Senator from Mississippi, when in the Senate the other day, speaking for this $200,000 appropriation, he said:

> Mr. President, service to man is the most acceptable service to God, and he who paints the pallid cheek of care with the rose of health, who causes to blossom in the garden of the heart made desolate by adversity the flower of hope, who fills the soul with cheer, stimulates courage, and helps the weak and faltering to try again—that man has lived and done the highest purposes of life. I hope this measure may receive the votes of every Senator in this Chamber.

That tells the story, and that is the way that Bostonians have of rating men—not by the size of their fortunes, but by the extent and quality of their service to their fellow men. Oh, I remember the great figures of my own boyhood, men who were pointed out to me to be remembered. They were such men as Wendell Phillips and James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and Phillips Brooks, and the immortal Boyle O'Reilly, champions in great causes, leaders in the warfare of humanity against the powers of darkness. [Applause.] I might go on in this vein, not to boast but to express the spirit of my city. But this would be to trespass on the time of this House too far. Mr. Speaker, if I have drifted into a eulogy of Boston, remember that I am her son, and the son does not criticize his mother.

I firmly believe the men of this Congress may well look to the future to be remembered by their action in cases such as now appeal to them, and when they vote to give to the stricken people of Salem this sum of money they will receive the everlasting gratitude of a never-forgetful and a never-ungrateful Commonwealth. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has six minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] has five.

Mr. PHELAN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I have just looked over the list of appropriations that have been made by previous Congresses for the various sections of the country when the people have suffered from fires, storms, and overflows, and I find that the Federal Government has been most generous and kind to my State and my section. We are now called on to vote in this instance for an appropriation of $200,000 to the distressed people of historic Salem, and for my part, under the circumstances, I am only too glad to vote substantial aid and encouragement to them. God knows, from what these gentlemen have said, the poor people need it. I recall that only a few years ago a most destructive storm swept south Mississippi devastating property and killing people, carrying in its path sorrow, wreck, and ruin. The Federal Government through Congress promptly and ungrudgingly came to our aid and assistance and appropriated $250,000 for that purpose. A little later another storm swept the district of my good friend, Mr. CANDLER, practically destroying the little town of Macon, Miss. Congress was liberal and again generously appropriated money for their relief. Year after year you have appropriated for the sufferers from the overflows of the Mississippi and other rivers. You having been so responsive to the call of my State and my section, I can not, for the life of me, see how any Representative from the South, and especially from my State, can vote against this appropriation, that will carry so much aid and assistance and materially relieve the distressed people of a locality in another section of our country. In such times as these, I believe that every section should help every other section, and when my name is called I shall happily and assuredly vote for a concurrence in the Senate amendment. I hope it will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I gladly express my appreciation, as a native-born citizen of Massachusetts, of the praise bestowed upon our State and the stricken city of Salem by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. Much of the early history of our country chronicled the deeds of the citizens of Massachusetts, and no place within its borders contributed more historic material than Salem, where 17,000 inhabitants have been rendered homeless by the devastating ravages of a terrible fire. If time permitted, I would call further attention to the history of the Bay State, but I can not do better than quote the words of a former noted Senator and one of America's most eloquent men, Daniel Webster:

> I shall enter on no encomium upon Massachusetts; she needs none. There she is. Behold her, and judge for yourselves. There is her history; the world knows it by heart.

Mr. Speaker, this request for an appropriation of $200,000 for the relief of the sufferers in Salem is not a local one. The relief committee, composed of prominent citizens of Boston and neighborhood, asked the governor of the State to act in behalf of the State in bringing the matter to the attention of the President and the Congress. One of the last acts of the legislature, which adjourned a few days ago, was to make an appropriation from the State treasury. The general public has been liberal in subscriptions, and up to yesterday had subscribed over $415,000. The citizens of our State have been generous and ever ready to answer the call of distress from other sections of the country and from foreign lands, as evidenced by the contributions made for the sufferers in San Francisco and Dayton and in Messina. So we ask for this appropriation, not in the spirit of charity, but as an act of simple justice to a community and a State willing at all times to answer the call of suffering humanity, whether at home or abroad.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, Congress has never yet declined to make appropriations where human life was at stake. Wherever the destruction of property is imminent and impending, and can be prevented, in those emergencies Congress has always responded. Wherever a condition has been such that we could endeavor to prevent the disaster, or to prevent the loss of life, we have responded. But in no case has it put itself in the attitude of becoming, as it were, an insurance company. Let me state to you that if you pass this appropriation, when floods shall come and break the levees in my State I propose to ask you to respond in enormous amounts of money. These appropriations that were made here were not appropriations for doing other than taking care of the situation while human life was likely to be lost. When the flood was all over my own place down in that section of the country, I was not in favor of taking care of the tenants on my place, but on the contrary, where those people who had no means were compelled to live, the Government simply gave them rations until the flood subsided, and as soon as the flood subsided the aid was withdrawn.

In fact the table placed in the RECORD on yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is misleading. These appropriations were to reimburse the War Department for rations and other expenses incurred by it under authority of Congress to prevent loss of life. The way it has always been done is this: When the overflow has been so great as to endanger the loss of life the Secretary of War is authorized to use the military stores to prevent the loss of life and Congress has simply passed appropriations to reimburse the War Department. We are willing to do this in this case. In fact we are doing that now. The National Guard of Massachusetts, through its governor, is using the Government tents, beds, blankets, and so forth, to care for the homeless. The Secretary of War extended further aid of this kind, and it was stated that it was not needed. If Congress goes beyond this sort of aid and enlarges upon the scope of aid the Federal Treasury will be swamped. It is a new doctrine that the people should be fed by the Federal Treasury when they are out of a job. They say yes, but the burning of this great factory was a great calamity. Yes; a most unfortunate one. We all regret it, but after the fire is out and the immediate distress resulting therefrom is relieved the obligation, according to all the precedents, is over. The people should bestir themselves and get busy and relieve themselves. They say that they are going to rebuild; then let the people be given work clearing away the débris and be employed to assist in the great work of rebuilding the destroyed property. Only about 1,800 of the 17,000 reported to have been left destitute are now without shelter, and they are in comfortable Army tents and on good Army beds.

Let the work of reconstruction begin and all will find work. What, will it be contended that the Government shall feed these people until the factory is rebuilt? Such a contention is most dangerous and leads into a most dangerous field. When the great Baltimore, Chicago, and Yazoo City fires occurred not a dollar was asked for and not a dollar paid. In the Mississippi flood, in all the cyclone disasters enumerated, no direct appropriation was ever made; only aid was extended through the Army, as I have indicated. Tents and beds and food were given for only a few days to relieve the immediate distress, and the Secretary of War presented his bill, which has been for food, drugs, and such aid as would give the community a few days to get on its feet. Already $489,000 has been raised; and this is more than ample to take care of 1,800 people for a few weeks until they can get work.

If there was any danger of loss of life here, I would not hesitate for one moment to vote for an appropriation to save human life. But merely because people are without jobs, because a factory has burned and the opportunity of obtaining a job is gone, it is idle to say that Congress ought to respond. If you do that, you should respond when an individual loses his home, if it is all he has. When a little town is wiped out, as a little town in my State was, there was not a dollar asked. Why? Because when men lose their jobs it is not the business of the Government to hunt up jobs for them. It is not the function of the Government; it is for the men to get out and hustle. If a factory had closed its doors for all time to come, would there be any man here who would say that these men ought to have Government aid?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, it is true, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says, that we propose to feed the unemployed and homeless sufferers from the Salem fire. What are the facts? Instead of $1,000,000, as he says, we need $1,700,000 all told, to relieve suffering and rehabilitate the city. The earning capacity of Salem has been wiped out, because its industries have been wiped out, and yet it will bond itself for $700,000 as a consequence of this fire. That is a grievous burden for a city with a population of 45,000 souls. Seven hundred thousand dollars and the interest on that sum must ultimately come right out of the city of Salem.

The State of Massachusetts is inhibited by its constitution from making a direct appropriation to help Salem out, but for poor relief in Salem, for the militia, by the rebate of taxes, and by the appropriation of supplies from public institutions the State has already entailed on itself an expense of $195,000. The legislature has adjourned, but doubtless in the next session there will be large additional bills to pay.

Yes, it is true that we are going to feed these people. You talk about it being our duty to find them other employment. The Lord knows that we would do so if we could. They do not want to eat the bread of idleness, but you can not take a cotton-mill operative and all of a sudden convert him into a foundryman or a laster.

The gentleman from New York says that no effort is being made to seek remunerative employment for those people. He is entirely mistaken. I happen to have in my pocket a letter to the Secretary of Labor written by Mr. John L. Saltonstall, a member of the local committee of labor in Salem. Mr. Saltonstall is bending his energies to accomplish the very results which the gentleman from New York declares that no one is seeking to accomplish.

The other gentleman says that a great rich State like Massachusetts ought to get along without national help, but he does not mention the fact that Massachusetts has always responded whenever help was urgently needed elsewhere. Let me read a telegram which I received this morning from the governor of the State of Massachusetts, sent by his secretary, Mr. John F. Meaney:

Amount raised in Massachusetts for the San Francisco relief fund, $815,000. Amount raised in Massachusetts for the Messina fund, $178,000. Amount raised in Massachusetts for the Dayton fund, $211,000.

[Applause.]

And yet the gentleman says that we come here with our hands outstretched asking for relief and that we are unwilling to do our share. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, it is not the most pleasant task in the world to appear on this floor in opposition to an amendment of this kind. And yet some of us conceive that it is our duty to defend an institution that recently and in recent years seems to have few friends—the National Treasury. Gentlemen have cited in advocacy of this appropriation numerous precedents, or what they call precedents, as a warrant for this appropriation. They fail utterly to mention other disasters that have occurred in our country where no appeal was made to the American Congress for aid and where the situation was taken care of by the local authorities.

A great many of us recall in recent years the great flood in the city of Galveston that swept away millions of property and thousands of human lives. More than 8,000 perished in that great disaster, and yet the Congress of the United States was not appealed to to care for the unfortunate there. In that locality and all over the State of Texas those that were charitably inclined, from Maine to California, responded to the needs and the needs were met.

Gentlemen of the House, it seems to me the strongest argument that can be advanced here as to why this appropriation should not be made, as to why there is no necessity for the Federal Treasury to be called upon in this instance, is the fact that a great State like Massachusetts, rich and powerful, that has contributed to other disasters, as just stated by the gentleman from that State, of millions of dollars, that it should come to the Congress of the United States, when, by their own statement, they need $1,700,000 for this situation, and ask for the pitiable sum of $200,000.

If you have any disaster at all, if there is any necessity for Government aid, $200,000 will not likely meet that necessity. Mr. Speaker, in all of these cases that have been cited by various gentleman there has been great loss of human life or imminent danger of great loss of life, and in these cases the National Government has gone to the rescue for the purpose of saving life. So far as the record goes, in this disaster at Salem, Mass., there was not a single life lost. The record before the Appropriations Committee in the hearings upon this subject shows that the property lost is infinitesimal when the insurance is paid. Contrast it with the great conflagration in Chicago, within the memory of some of us, when there was no contribution made from the National Treasury. Think of the flood at Johnstown, that destroyed hundreds of lives and millions of property, and yet that was taken care of without an invasion of the National Treasury. I recall that in 1887 or 1886 there was a drought that devastated the whole western half, practically, of the empire of Texas. A bill passed Congress appropriating money to furnish seeds that these people might plant their crops. It went to the White House, where there was a Democrat who believed in the local authorities taking care of the things for which they were created and in protecting the National Treasury, and Grover Cleveland vetoed that bill and said it was the duty of the citizen to support his Government and not the business of Governments to support the people.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No; I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to Senate amendment 163 with an amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 76, noes 33.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and there were yeas 162, nays 64, answered "present" 6, not voting 201, as follows:

Page 3, strike out all of lines 11 to 18, inclusive.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there are two amendments. I think they ought to be acted upon separately.

The SPEAKER. There is one amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are two propositions, and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] wishes to address himself to the second proposition.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the amendment which proposes to eliminate the provision in this bill granting an increase of pension to Jerusha Hayward Brown. The bill as it passed the Senate granted to this woman a pension of $50 per month. It has been stricken out by the House committee on the ground that the pension she is now receiving is considered fully commensurate. I want to say that this is an extremely unusual case. This old lady is now about 91 years of age. She married her soldier husband in 1846. He had an honorable service in the Civil War, retiring with the rank of lieutenant colonel. He died in 1903. In addition to being the widow of a soldier she is also the daughter of a distinguished officer of the War of the Revolution, and therefore is one of the few surviving real daughters of the Revolution. I had intended to ask the House to disagree to the amendment of the House committee, but I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that the consideration of private pension bills is very largely a unanimous-consent procedure. Having the utmost confidence in the distinguished gentlemen who constitute the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and especially knowing the great generosity and the liberal disposition of those who will be the conferees, and believing that when this bill gets into conference and when they consider the circumstances of this case, the great age of this claimant and the fact that she is without any means, except the pension that she now receives, they will consent to recede from the amendment and permit this increase to become a law, because it is just and meritorious and because she will not be permitted in all probability of drawing it but a short time.

For all of these reasons I am not going to ask the House to disagree to the amendment of the committee, and will leave the matter to the generosity of the conferees.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that my friend from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] has consented to make no fight against this amendment at this time. The committee of the House by unanimous vote struck this item from the bill, and, of course, the committee, as represented to-day, by only two or three members, could not consent to this amendment if the gentleman should offer it. But, as he states, the committee of conference, when appointed, will probably go over this matter again, and if it appears that it is just and proper that this item should be restored, I am sure the committee of conference will be disposed to do what is right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FOSTER. I observe that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has reported these Senate bills. I judge that these are all the pension bills that have been passed by the Senate up to this time. Is that true?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, can the gentleman from Missouri inform the House how many House pension bills are still in the Senate and have not been acted upon there?

Mr. RUSSELL. There is only one.

Mr. FOSTER. Just one?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. So that they have not passed that one bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. We have one House bill that they have not passed.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems that for some reason or other they have not been reporting these pension bills there as promptly as you have been doing it here in the House?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; they are behind; but about 10 days ago they passed five of our House bills, and they have gone through conference, and the conference reports were agreed to here yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. But not in the Senate?

Mr. RUSSELL. They have gone to the Senate, but have not been agreed to yet, unless it was done to-day. But the Senate has passed, in all, eight of our House bills.

Mr. FOSTER. So there is one more left?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; one more.

Mr. FOSTER. So that we have passed here all the Senate bills that have come over here up to this time?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. But there is one that has not yet come back here that was passed by the House some time ago?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; one bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the gentleman tell us how long ago that was?

Mr. RUSSELL. I believe it was the last Friday in May. The clerk of the committee so informs me. I did not remember the date. The clerk of the committee says it was the last Friday in May. They passed it through the committee and put it on the calendar one day last week.

Mr. FOSTER. It has just been on the calendar for a short time?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it not a fact that in the other body there were a number of Senate bills reported and on the calendar for a number of weeks before they were considered in the Senate?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes. They have passed our bills as promptly as they have passed the Senate bills.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The point I want to make is that there has been no apparent effort on the part of the Senate to treat the House bills differently from the Senate bills?

Mr. RUSSELL. No. I think the Senate has simply been busy with other important legislation. I do not think there is any disposition to defeat our bills or to delay them.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] withdraws his pro forma amendment. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill 5843.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment by inserting the following.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report. On what page does this amendment come?

Mr. MONDELL. At the end of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, after line 2, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"The name of Elizabeth C. Miller, widow of Samuel Miller, late of Company K, Ninety-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this item appeared on page 8 of the bill, but was stricken out by the committee. I hope the House can see its way clear, and I hope the Committee on Invalid Pensions can see its way clear, to reconsider that action. It is a peculiar case, and yet an exceedingly meritorious one. I assume that the committee struck out the item because of the peculiar facts.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the committee amendment striking it out been agreed to?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say that I was not here at the time the item was reached in the bill, but I realize that the matter has been passed upon.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would be subject to a point of order. I do not know whether the point of order will be raised or not.

Mr. MONDELL. It is subject to a point of order. I realize that; but I hope the point of order will not be made. It is an exceedingly meritorious case. This woman is 78 years of age. She has practically no income.

Before the Civil War this soldier married a woman, and later they separated. It seems he did not secure a divorce, but he left the first wife a great many years ago. She never took any trouble to learn of his whereabouts. Years after, in 1877, he married the beneficiary of this item and lived with her for many years. She has no income worth mentioning, and is an exceedingly worthy woman.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the first wife living or is she dead?

Mr. MONDELL. The first wife is dead. She died in 1910.

Mr. FOSTER. But I understand the last one was never married to the soldier.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; she was married to the soldier.

Mr. FOSTER. She went through a legal marriage?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. But the soldier really had no right to contract the marriage with this woman; is that it?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. There is a little colloquy taking place which we can not hear. If this is a session of Congress, we ought to know what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The committee will be in order. Gentlemen will please speak so that they may be heard.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the committee, and I will be very brief. The report shows that——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. The facts in this case, as shown by the Senate report, are, the soldier was married to claimant at Cheyenne, Wyo., July 9, 1877, and they lived together as husband and wife until soldier died. The claimant filed a claim February 28, 1913, under the act of April 19, 1908, which has never been adjudicated. It appears from evidence filed that in March, 1856, she was married to William Hadaman, with whom she lived as his wife until about 1874, when he committed the crime of incest, for which he was convicted and sentenced to the Kansas State Penitentiary for two years. She was informed by the sheriff of the county that the conviction and sentence of her former husband divorced her from him, and she knew nothing to the contrary until after she had filed her claim for pension, when she ascertained that formal application to the courts and a decree were necessary to a legal divorce. She moved with her children to Nebraska; believed herself divorced, and in this belief married the soldier, Samuel Miller. She has been unable to learn anything of her first husband since his release from the Kansas State Penitentiary in 1876, and knows nothing of his movements and whereabouts since that time. He was a soldier in the Union Army during the Civil War, but has never applied for a pension, which, no doubt, he would have done if he were living, and she believes him to be long since dead.

It further appears from the evidence filed that in April, 1852, the soldier, Samuel Miller, was married to his first wife, Rebecca Miller, and that he left her about 1872 or 1873 and never afterwards returned to her. He had three children by the first wife, one of whom is, perhaps, still living. Claimant declares that soldier informed her prior to their marriage that his first wife was dead and that both believed themselves free to marry. The first wife, however, did not die until October 12, 1910. Claimant was recognized as soldier's wife in the community in which they lived and he left her by his will such property as he had. She is unable to establish her claim at the Pension Bureau by proving the divorce of her first husband and the death of soldier's first wife prior to his marriage to claimant in July, 1877.

Claimant is 78 years of age. It is shown that both she and the soldier were of good character and high repute during the 30 years and more they resided in Wyoming. It is further shown that claimant is in necessitous circumstances, having only a small amount of property, which is mortgaged for two-thirds its value and which yields an income of approximately $100 a year. The evidence indicates that she married the soldier in good faith, believing she could properly do so, and she lived with him as his wife for over 35 years and succeeded to his property when he died. The beneficiary, the claimant in this case, the wife of the soldier since 1877, has taken care of him and looked after him. She is more than 78 years old and has practically no property or income. It does seem to me that we might overlook the irregularity of the case and grant her a pension. I know her to be a fine woman and a woman of excellent character. She has always been a good wife since her marriage to this soldier, and certainly does need the pension.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, this claim was considered by the House committee, and the committee thought that it was an improper claim to be allowed. The fact seems to be undisputed that both of these parties, Mrs. Miller and her husband, were married previously to this marriage, and neither one of them had a divorce.

Mr. MONDELL. In the case of Mrs. Miller, if the chairman will remember, her first husband was convicted of a serious crime many years ago and sent to the penitentiary. The woman took it for granted that his conviction freed her from her marriage obligations. She never thereafter considered herself the wife of the convict, never saw him or heard of him, and quite a number of years afterwards she married the soldier.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is a fact that she did not get a divorce.

Mr. MONDELL. She never got a divorce from her first husband because, as she said, she made inquiries in regard to it and understood that the conviction of her husband amounted to an annulment of her marriage and that it was not necessary for her to secure a divorce.

Mr. RUSSELL. She doubtless had good grounds for a divorce but never obtained it. It was also a fact that her husband was a married man and had not been divorced when she married him.

Mr. MONDELL. He had been separated from his wife for years; it was not a recent separation, and Mrs. Miller is not to be blamed for that separation. The claimant in this case is not to be blamed because she did not know about the antecedents of the soldier. She is responsible in regard to her own case; but her excuse is that, her husband having been convicted as a felon, she was informed that it was not necessary to secure a divorce from him.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the House committee felt that it was a very dangerous precedent to set, and in violation of all the previous practices of the House and the committee of the House, and it was stricken out by unanimous vote of that committee. I could not to-day consent to restore it to the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of what the chairman of the committee has said, I withdraw my motion, and hope that in conference the equities of this case will be considered. Mrs. Miller is a thoroughly good woman, and a well-meaning and deserving woman. I think she is entitled to the pension, and she certainly does need it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand she has no property?

Mr. MONDELL. Nothing to amount to anything.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is she in feeble health?

Mr. MONDELL. She is 78 years old and not at all strong. If she was in perfect health she could not be very strong, being a woman of that age. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment. I fear the case may be prejudiced by my pressing it. I hope it will be agreed to in conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. In view of the suggestion that this may be considered in conference which was made by the gentleman from Missouri, and the wish expressed that it might be done by the gentleman from Wyoming, I want to say that quite recently I had a case on all fours with this case. The difference in that case was that the claimant, who was a widow, had not been married, but her husband had been married and never obtained a divorce from his wife. The case was refused in the department under the general law. I thereupon looked into the precedents that had been followed by the Committee on Pensions, with a view of determining whether or not it would be proper for me to introduce a bill. I make it a rule in regard to the introduction of pension bills not to introduce a bill that I am not willing to stand behind and urge with all possible vigor. I have in two or three instances been misled in the introduction of bills that I could not stand behind. After examining the precedents I came to the conclusion that there was no chance of obtaining relief in my case which, I say, is almost on all fours with the case of the gentleman from Wyoming. I really hope the precedent will not be made.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. These people were married in due and regular form and lived together as man and wife for 35 years.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. In the case which I have in mind the people lived together, I think, for 25 years. They were duly married, but the husband had not been divorced from his former wife.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if we have a rule which prevents pensioning in cases of that kind, it is a rule which would be more honored in the breach than in the observance, because to all intents and purposes in the eyes of God and the law this woman was the wife of that soldier.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, there is force in the suggestion the gentleman makes perhaps, and I am not saying there is not, but without arguing that question, if it is true, then certainly there are enough of these cases to create a distinctive class, and there ought to be a general law to fit those cases rather than special bills. I do not agree with all that a great many of my colleagues on that side say in regard to having these cases come under a general law. I realize that there are peculiar conditions that arise which sometimes render a special bill equitable, but the conditions presented in the case by the gentleman from Wyoming, and similar cases, if they are equitable, could be covered in a class by a general act, rather than by special bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws the pro forma amendment, and the question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution No. 288 be taken from the Speaker's table and considered, and placed upon its passage. It is House joint resolution 288, to amend an act entitled "An act granting pension and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved May 2, 1914.

The object of the resolution, if I may be permitted to explain it now, is to correct errors in a certain omnibus pension bill which has become a law. They have been discovered at the Pension Bureau, and that bureau refuses to honor these items unless they are corrected.

The SPEAKER. This is a House joint resolution?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution No. 288, which the Clerk will report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by errors in printing the bill reported by the House Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 11260, approved May 2, 1914 (Private, No. 22), the designation of the military service of one James L. Ackley, late of Company L, First Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Cavalry, was changed to read First Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry; and the designation of the military service of one Tobias Stiles, late of Company F, Fifty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read Fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry; and the designation of the military service of one James Rhykerd, late of unassigned One hundred and eleventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read Eleventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry; and the designation of the military service of one John Carver, late of Company B, Thirteenth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, was changed to read Thirteenth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry; and the designation of the military service of one William A. Yantis, late of band, First Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, was changed to read First Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry; and the designation of the military service of one Jeremiah Dillane, late of Company G, First Regiment California Volunteer Cavalry, was changed to read First Regiment California Volunteer Infantry; and the designation of the military service of one William H. Warner, late of Company D, Fortieth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read One hundred and fortieth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry; and in the claim of Lucinda Saint John, widow of James N. Saint John, late of Company H, Twenty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read Lucinda Saint John, widow of John N. Saint John: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved May 2, 1914 (Private, No. 22, 63d Cong.), granting an increase of pension to one James L. Ackley, be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of James L. Ackley, late of Company L, First Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

That the paragraph in said act granting an increase of pension to one Elizabeth Stiles be corrected and amended so as to read as follows: "The name of Elizabeth Stiles, widow of Tobias Stiles, late of Company F, Fifty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

That the paragraph in said act granting a pension to one Lucy A. Rhykerd be corrected and amended so as to read as follows: "The name of Lucy A. Rhykerd, widow of James Rhykerd, late of unassigned One hundred and eleventh Regiment, New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

That the paragraph in said act granting an increase of pension to one John Carver be corrected and amended so as to read as follows: "The name of John Carver, late of Company B, Thirteenth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

That the paragraph in said act granting an increase of pension to one William A. Yantis be corrected and amended so as to read as follows: "The name of William A. Yantis, late of band, First Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

That the paragraph in said act granting an increase of pension to one Catharine Dillane be corrected and amended so as to read as follows: "The name of Catharine Dillane, widow of Jeremiah Dillane, late of Company G, First Regiment California Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

That the paragraph in said act granting an increase of pension to one William H. Warner be corrected and amended so as to read as follows: "The name of William H. Warner, late of Company D, Fortieth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

That the paragraph in said act granting a pension to one Lucinda Saint John be corrected and amended so as to read as follows: "The name of Lucinda Saint John, widow of James N. Saint John, late of Company H, Twenty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that all those errors occurred in one bill?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Just as a matter of curiosity, how did they happen?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. I have no knowledge. When these bills were introduced individually they were correct, but the errors appear to have been in the printing.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not in the enrollment?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. No; I did not examine the enrolled bill. We examined the report and the printed bill that was introduced in the House after it came from the committee, and in some instances the errors appeared there. In other instances the errors appear later on. I think in one instance the error appeared in the printing that was done for the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is remarkable that so many errors should occur in one bill.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. It is that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Ought not the preamble to be stricken out?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it is customary to retain the preamble to a joint resolution, but not to a bill.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 11, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, Almighty Father, in spite of the widespread secularism of our day, that the Christ spirit obtains to a larger degree in the hearts of men than ever before; that there is less dogma, more religion, less bigotry, more brotherly love, less sectarianism, more toleration; yet we are far from the kingdom, and we pray for more of the spirit which makes for righteousness, that wars shall cease to be, peace and good will reign supreme everywhere, in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AVIATION SERVICE.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Speaker lay before the House the bill H. R. 5304.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 5304. An act to increase the efficiency of the Aviation Service of the Army, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SALEM DISASTER.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement for the RECORD. On the vote on the appropriation for the Salem disaster I am recorded as voting "present." As a matter of fact, I answered "no" and then changed my vote to "present," being paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE. He would have voted for the amendment and I against it. I thought it would appear in the RECORD as paired, but it does not, and I wish to make this statement of our respective attitudes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to ask to have the RECORD corrected, or simply to make a statement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is correct; it is not a correction of the RECORD. The Chair has studied for some time this matter of voting "present." Sometimes there will be 15 or 20 Members in front of the Clerk's desk after a roll is called twice, with a request to withdraw their votes, stating that they were paired and want to answer "present." It seems to the Chair, although he is not trying to force the matter on anyone or rule in regard to it, that it is an absolute waste of time. If a Member is paired, the proper thing for him to do in the first instance is to answer "present."

CHARLES R. GRANT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6464) to muster in and muster out Charles R. Grant, late a volunteer of the Army in the Civil War, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY E. DE COSTER.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 516 (H. Rept. 952).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Mary E. De Coster, widow of the late Capt. Francisco V. De Coster, a deliveryman of documents to the House document room, the committees of the House, and the House Office Building, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death; said sum to be paid from the contingent fund of the House, and to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

The following committee amendments were read:

Line 3, after the word "pay" insert "out of the contingent fund of the House."

Strike out in lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 the words "said sum to be paid from the contingent fund of the House, and to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances," and insert in lieu thereof "and a sum not exceeding $250 to defray the funeral expenses of said Francisco V. De Coster."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSENGERS IN THE POST OFFICE.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 550 (H. Rept. 951).

Resolved, That 14 messengers in the post office of the House now authorized to be employed from December 1, 1913, until June 30, 1914, inclusive, may continue to be employed during the remainder of the present session of Congress and be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 2, strike out the word "now."

On page 1, line 6, after the word "Congress," insert the words "and receive pay from July 1, 1914."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have read by the Clerk a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The proper way to introduce the resolution is through the basket. If the gentleman desires to have unanimous consent to have it read, very good.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have it read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is it?

Mr. FALCONER. It is a resolution having to do with a matter in Vera Cruz. An acquaintance of mine, a man who is in the employ of the Newspaper Enterprise Association, has recently been ordered deported because of a story he sent out relative to the extraordinary actions of certain naval officers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17824, the general deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington may have the privilege of extending his remarks in the RECORD and also that I may have the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is the request of the gentleman from Washington disposed of?

The SPEAKER. No. The gentleman from California undertook to couple his request with that request.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from California tries to take an unfair advantage, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from Washington——

The SPEAKER. The matter is not debatable.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER] to extend his remarks in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, had objection not been raised, I would have asked for immediate consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Department of War and the Department of the Navy be, and are hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives copies of all correspondence and orders in the matter of the order of deportation of Fred L. Boalt, a correspondent of the Cleveland Press and affiliated newspapers, from Vera Cruz, on account of the publication of an article alleging that an officer of the United States Navy and marines under his command applied the "law of flight," firing upon unarmed Mexican prisoners during the occupation of Vera Cruz.

Resolved further, That the said departments advise the House of Representatives at whose initiative Boalt was ordered deported, and whether or not testimony now being taken at the court of inquiry now being held on board the U. S. battleship Texas, at Vera Cruz, is being censored by the officers of the United States Army.

My purpose for introducing this resolution is plainly understood by the context and wording.

Mr. Speaker, Fred L. Boalt was a resident of my State, a newspaper man in Seattle, and his professional ethics and standard of integrity have secured for him a high place in the esteem of his coworkers and the newspaper fraternity generally.

It is my opinion, sir, that Mr. Boalt would not write a story without fact, and his story is so extraordinary that in this modern day of civilization it commands the attention of the public.

We have heard much of late of the dove of peace, flitting hither and thither, from the abode of the Carnegie Peace Commission to the Department of State, and we are moved to inquire if it can be possible that while the principle of the "brotherhood of man" is being promulgated here in this great country, and with special emphasis being placed upon our own—America's—high standards, embracing the new freedom, if it can be possible, sir, that the mailed hand of the United States reaching out and beyond our own borders into the land of a neighboring Republic and there in one of its fairest cities viciously murders defenseless citizens in a manner unworthy of the time in which we live and of the country we call our own.

Mr. Boalt's article, sent out to the Newspaper Enterprise Association from Vera Cruz, which caused his arrest and an order issued for his deportation, is:

When the Americans took Vera Cruz, an ensign, in his student days perhaps the best fullback Annapolis ever had, had command of a squad of men who took many prisoners.

The prisoners were corraled in a room. At a word from the ensign they were released and told to scurry for the next corner. Those who reached it in safety, in the opinion of the ensign, deserved to live.

But very few did.

The ensign applied the "ley de fuga"—the law of flight.

The law of flight is not nice. The rules of civilized warfare forbid the application of the law of flight.

But war is war; and one American naval officer did apply the law of flight. He admits it; boasts of it. Curiously enough, his friends applaud him for it. Hundreds of American Army and Navy officers and men know that this ensign and his men applied the forbidden law of flight—made sport of prisoners of war, and even noncombatants, giving them a flying start and "potting" them as they fled.

I have been told that it was fun to see them run.

When I was a boy, I had a bulldog who applied the law of flight.

The trick was for the dog to catch, if he could, all the rats before they reached the split-rail fence which surrounded the pasture. Once through the fence, there was no catching the rats, because they lost themselves in tall grass. I remember that the first rat that left the trap never got more than a foot from it. The second ran a yard, perhaps. And so on. The last rat always tried desperately to reach the fence.

But it was very seldom that even the last rat escaped that bulldog's snapping jaws. I imagine that my bulldog and the young ensign and ex-football star, whom I have mentioned, both of whom applied the law of flight, are somewhat alike

Immediately upon learning of this story at Vera Cruz by the military authorities Mr. Boalt was arrested.

Mr. Boalt insisted that facts substantiated his story. He was ordered deported. He communicated with his news connections in Chicago, and from there came the story of his predicament to his associaties here in Washington.

The matter was immediately taken up with the Navy Department. The Navy Department indicated it would investigate the matter.

Mr. Speaker, we want to get the details of this incident. We desire to know who initiated demand for arrest and deportation of Mr. Boalt, and we want the facts brought out at the court of inquiry placed before the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the tariff.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the tariff. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. On what subject? Let us have the subject. I think that it is due to the House that every gentleman who asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD should state upon what subject he expects to extend his remarks.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I hope to extend them on the subject of the Kinkaid bill, if I get the privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the general deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] if we can agree on 40 minutes' debate on a side?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that I have had requests for four hours of general debate upon this side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is everybody on that side losing his head in the hot weather? [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. We have not had any general debate for a long time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the Republicans have been doing nothing but talking.

Mr. GILLETT. Well, that is all the minority is allowed to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no desire on this side to debate the bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Let me tell the gentleman that it is saving time in a certain way, because much of the time for which I have been asked was to have been granted when the House had under consideration the general dam bill, but it is much more appropriate on an appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the minority side be limited to four hours.

Mr. GILLETT. I am content with that.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but how much does the gentleman's side of the House propose to use?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We will not use so much time as that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, you never can tell.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know from the general character of the indiscriminate assaults that are made upon the administration by the other side that we will need hardly two or three minutes to dispose of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. But it always does take more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of all the minority in the House on this bill in general debate be limited to four hours, to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

The SPEAKER. And how much for the majority?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not limiting that. We will not use very much.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four hours for the minority.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the general debate is going to take the usual course of talking on any subject the gentlemen see fit to talk about, I suppose? Is that right?

M. FITZGERALD. If a Member gets the floor, he can talk on anything under the sun.

Mr. DONOVAN. And then it is going to follow under the five-minute rule, where they will ask to extend their time, and then talk on any subject that they see fit? That will probably follow, will it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am unable to predict what this House is likely to do.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that the ranking member of the minority the other day suggested in one of his talks that the presence of the minority was essential to prevent abuses, and I believe he then hied himself away, and we have hardly looked upon his face since.

Mr. GARNER. To whom does the gentleman refer by the ranking Member of the minority—the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]?

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. DONOVAN. Oh, I am not referring to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], although he is the ranking member of every committee here. [Laughter.] I take it that the gentleman is interested in well-doing in this body. We met here last Monday, and there were only 67 Members present to do business. We tried to get a quorum and could not do it. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], instead of trying to get unanimous consent to allow a few Members to talk on every subject under the sun, should try to get the Members of Congress here to do business, and then insist——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I object to this indiscriminate lecture and to the gentleman criticizing me when I am trying to perform a public duty.

Mr. DONOVAN. We have been listening to indiscriminate lectures from the gentleman from time to time here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It evidently has not had the effect it should have upon the gentleman.

Mr. DONOVAN. I will say to the gentleman from New York——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, the gentleman from New York, pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four hours——

Mr. FITZGERALD. To those opposed to the bill, to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], and that I be permitted to control the time on this side, and this side will not take more than four hours. I will make that suggestion.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, pending that motion, asks unanimous consent that the minority shall have not more than four hours of general debate, to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], and if the majority concludes it wants to debate the bill it shall have not more than four hours, to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, first, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, is there objection to the request?

Mr. DONOVAN. I am reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the regular order is called for.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the Speaker deny the right to reserve the right to object?

The SPEAKER. Whenever the regular order is demanded it is the business of the Speaker——

Mr. DONOVAN. But a gentleman should rise from his seat when he calls for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. It was demanded two or three times before when the gentleman was standing up.

Mr. DONOVAN. Who has asked for the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois was the last one.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided between the two sides, to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be divided between the two sides, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order, and the regular order is, is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects, and the question is on the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider H. R. 17824.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Accordingly the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] will take the chair.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The House has just resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DONOVAN. But I am not too late to raise the question of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not raise the question of a quorum in the House, because the House has gone into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. DONOVAN. How does it go into Committee——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing on earth to do with the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. How can the House be in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union before a Chairman has been appointed by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already appointed the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17824, the general deficiency bill. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut objects and the Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read at length.

During the reading of the bill the following occurred:

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, in the first reading of the bill it should be read in full and a part of it should not be skipped.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman has no right to interrupt the proceedings of the committee, and I ask for order so that business may be transacted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Connecticut is mistaken, and it is not in order to interrupt the reading of the bill. The Clerk will read.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. The Clerk is not reading the bill. He is skipping a part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not discovered it; the Chair is watching the Clerk, and the Chair will see that the gentleman from Connecticut is protected. The Chair hopes there will be order, so that he can see the gentleman from Connecticut is not defrauded. The Clerk will read.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. The Clerk is skipping part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not observed any skipping. The gentleman from Connecticut will please not interrupt the reading.

Mr. DONOVAN. We are entitled to a reading of the bill, Mr. Chairman. I take it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair hopes the gentleman will be careful to discover a mistake before he attempts to correct one.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FLOOD of Virginia). The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes out of the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the following appeared in the Washington Times:

ALTOONA, PA., July 8.

With every department of the Altoona shops, the industrial center of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., working full time, and many departments working overtime, this city is enjoying an unsurpassed era of prosperity. An order for 81 freight engines, the largest ever used by the Pennsylvania, has been placed with the Juniata shops, while an order has just been placed with the car shops for a thousand all-steel box cars, the most costly equipment of its kind ever ordered by the railroad.

Mr. Chairman, we have been told so often of late that a condition of business stagnation exists all over the land that it is with genuine pleasure that I read this telegram. Some of our Republican colleagues in this House have told us that there is financial depression everywhere, that thousands of wage earners are out of employment, and that a terrible panic is bound to come unless the American people decide to do one thing, namely, put the old stand-pat Republican Party back into power. It certainly is refreshing to learn that there is at least one city which finds itself exempt from the ruinous conditions we have heard described. No need of soup houses in Altoona. Indeed, it is just possible that a few of the great army of unemployed may find work if they can only get to Altoona, for this telegram informs us that every department of the Altoona shops is working on full time, while in many departments the shops are running overtime. The news is no doubt especially pleasing to our Republican colleagues from the great State of Pennsylvania. The statement of conditions must be true, for a similar telegram appeared in a Philadelphia paper, the organ of stand-pat Republicanism in that State. Likewise, Mr. Chairman, I learned on good authority that a great manufacturing concern in New England, which employs approximately 15,000 operators, positively declined, about the first of this month, to give those operators a half holiday unless they would agree to work overtime to make up for the loss of that half day. The company was behind time in filling orders. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that conditions are not so bad as we have heard described in this Chamber. Let us not forget that just a year ago the stage appeared to be all set for a panic which was scheduled to arrive about that time. The panic was fortunately averted by vigorous action of Mr. Wilson's administration.

Mr. Chairman, in a great Nation like ours there will probably never be a time when men can not be found out of employment in the great cities. There will probably never be a week when some failure in business is not announced. The purpose of those gentlemen who have been crying panic and hard times is plain. They are striving to put the Republican Party back into power. They do not mention the Roosevelt panic of 1907. They tell us men are out of employment in Chicago, for instance. The Democratic Party is in power, therefore the Democratic Party is responsible for the failure of these Chicago men to get work. These apostles of hard times do not tell us that during the Roosevelt administration and the Taft administration men were also walking the streets of Chicago in search of employment. At no time during the 16 months of the Wilson administration has there been a condition which approached in seriousness the disastrous Roosevelt panic. On the contrary, there has been steady improvement; and even those gentlemen who cry hard times will not deny that the President and those associated with him have done what they could to make impossible the recurrence of another Roosevelt panic.

But I did not rise, Mr. Chairman, to enter into a discussion of the general condition of the country. I rose to remind those gentlemen on the other side of the aisle who have been crying hard times that the Republican minority in this Chamber can not consistently criticize the administration so long as you yourselves are divided in your support of the administration measures.

Since the Democratic Party came into power five great measures have been passed by the House of Representatives, two of which have become laws, while three at this time are being considered by the Senate.

Let us consider first the trade commission bill. That is one which we are told is going to bring ruin and disaster to the country. It is now pending in the Senate. There was not even a roll call over here. Here is what happened in this Chamber as told by the RECORD of that day:

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.
The bill was passed.

If this is a ruinous measure, who is responsible for it? You are just as much responsible as we are.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman hear anybody on this side of the House say it was a ruinous measure?

Mr. POU. No; but the gentleman knows that there has been an attack in the press not only upon other measures but upon this one as well, and I am going to show further on that not only on this but on four of these measures you split to pieces over there; and if this legislation is bad, you are as much responsible for it as we are, and it is time to quit calamity howling when you yourselves are voting for the Wilson administration measures.

The trust bill I will mention next. On that the yeas were 297 and the nays 54. There are 145 of you over there. Where were the remainder of you when this roll was called? Only 54 were found who were willing to go on record against this "ruinous measure" known as the Clayton bill. This bill has been the target of Republican criticism. If it is going to ruin the country, why did you vote for it? If it is going to ruin business, why did you not present a solid front against it? There are 145 Members of this body who are not Democrats, yet there were just 54 who were willing to go on record against the Clayton bill. No man can deny the significance of this. The minority in the Chamber not only did not present a solid front against this bill, but 57 Members actually voted with us. I think the country should know exactly who these gentlemen are. They are to be commended, not criticized. For my part, I entertain the highest respect for the position they took. It means that they are not narrow-minded partisans. It means that they have the courage of their convictions. Their list of names constitutes a roll of honor which I am going to put in the RECORD.

Republican and Progressive roll of honor, composed of those who supported the Clayton antitrust bill:

Anderson	Gardner	Lindbergh	Sloan
Barton	Good	McKenzie	Smith, Idaho
Bell, Cal.	Green, Iowa	McLaughlin	Smith, J. M. C.

Let us next consider the Rayburn bill, which a great many people believe is much needed. Certain gentlemen have been engaging in high finance in this country. Watered stock has been sold to the people, and hundreds of homes have been ruined, because when men buy stocks and bonds they do not know what they are getting. I do not need to mention instances. You see them all around you every day now—railroads going into the hands of receivers and stock bought by innocent purchasers going down to almost nothing, and bringing ruin and disaster to homes throughout the land. The Wilson administration said this ought to be stopped, and the Rayburn bill was reported to the House; and here is the vote on it—yeas 325, nays 12.

Republican and Progressive roll of honor, composed of those who supported the Reyburn bill:

Anderson	Chandler, N. Y.	French	Hinebaugh
Anthony	Copley	Gardner	Howell
Austin	Curry	Good	Hulings

Think of that, if you please—just 12 Members were willing to go on record against this bill. If it is not a righteous bill, why did so many of you vote for it? If it is not a good bill, why did 101 Republicans and Progressives vote with the Democrats when the bill was passed by the House? Can you consistently criticize a bill which you yourself supported on a roll call? I am not criticizing any man who supported the bill. Remember, if you please, there are 145 Members who are not Democrats. If this is a bad bill from your standpoint, there should have been at least 145 votes against it.

No, Mr. Chairman, the Rayburn bill is not going to ruin business, as every intelligent man knows; on the contrary it is going to help legitimate business; certainly this House thinks so, for there were only 12 votes against it. Where were all those calamity howlers when that roll was called; these men who have been predicting disaster and wanting Congress to adjourn in order to save the country? Just 12 men, as I have said, marched up and voted against the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. GOOD. To which of the great measures the gentleman has mentioned, the tariff bill or the trust bills, may the country look for relief from the high cost of living? Which one of these measures will bring about the low cost of living as promised by the Democratic Party, and when will it come?

Mr. POU. The country may look, I think, to all of these measures for some relief from burdensome conditions. If the gentleman will go and ask his wife she will tell him now that the reduction in the cost of living has already commenced, as she finds when she goes to any great department store. Probably you have not talked to your wife lately about this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman enumerate some of the articles which are selling cheaper now at retail, for instance in the city of Washington?

Mr. POU. Yes; I will mention one of them. You can get nine pounds more of sugar for $1 than you could under your Republican high tariff.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. In order to have order. The gentleman can not interrupt unless he addresses the Chair first.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken.

Mr. POU. Coming on down a little further to the currency bill——

Mr. GOOD. Can the gentleman name only one article?

Mr. POU. I have already mentioned one article to the gentleman, and I said if he would talk with his wife she would probably mention some others to him.

Mr. GOOD. But will the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. POU. No; I prefer not to do so now. I may take time later on and investigate the proposition suggested by the gentleman. There are numerous articles, some of them among the necessaries of life, which have gone down in price; not much, it is true, but they have gone down some, and I predict they will go down more. At any rate, that is what the proprietors of the great department stores in the cities have been telling us, and they ought to know.

But I did not rise to discuss prices, Mr. Chairman. I rose for another purpose. Some of you gentlemen over there have been saying that this administration is ruining the country, and you have been trying to bring pressure upon Congress to adjourn. I charge that you are responsible to a very considerable extent for nearly all the legislation which has been put through this House up to this time. You have no right to sit in your seats over there and remain silent or vote "aye" on this measure or that measure and then cry out to the country that Mr. Wilson is ruining the country by pressing these very measures to final passage.

Now I come to the Underwood bill. Yeas 255, nays 104. You got 104 out of the 145. That is the best you could do on even the Underwood measure.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. GOOD. I just wanted to ask a question in regard to the vote.

Mr. POU. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman does not mean to say that the Republicans voted for the Underwood tariff bill, does he?

Mr. POU. No; I do not. But some of them did.

Mr. GOOD. How many?

Mr. POU. I do not know how many. There were several. I have their names here. There were several distinguished gentlemen on that side who voted for the Underwood tariff bill. I am sorry that there were not more; but there were some.

Mr. GOOD. You can not charge any sins in voting for that bill to this side of the House.

Mr. POU. One of them I find was the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague on the Committee on Rules, Mr. KELLY.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not mean to call Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania a Republican?

Mr. POU. He was put on the Committee on Rules to represent the Republican Party. I find also Mr. MACDONALD here; I find also Mr. MANAHAN, Mr. RUPLEY, and Mr. STAFFORD.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman is going to call "Republicans" the four Progressives who voted for that tariff bill, we are going to mob him for it. [Laughter.] We are not Republicans, and we will not stand for the application of any such name as that to us.

Mr. POU. All that I know is that the Committee on Rules is one of the most important committees of the House, and Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania was put on that committee, not as a Democrat but as an anti-Democrat. I wish he were a Democrat, because he is an earnest, honest, patriotic, young man; and he had the nerve to stand up here and vote his convictions also on the currency measure.

Now, we come to the currency bill, a bill which everybody admits has been needed for a generation. Mr. Wilson had the nerve to insist upon its prompt passage. It was a "bad" bill until it was passed, and then suddenly it got to be a good bill. On the currency bill the yeas were 286 and the nays were 85. You got little more than 50 per cent of your own vote against the bill.

Here is a list of the Republicans and Progressives who supported the measure.

Republican and Progressive roll of honor, composed of those who supported a Democratic currency bill:

Bell, Cal.	Frear	Lindquist	Rupley
Browne, Wis.	Haugen	McLaughlin	Smith, J. M. C.
Cary	Helgesen	MacDonald	Smith, Minn.
Cooper	Hinebaugh	Manahan	Smith, Sami. W.
Cramton	Kelley, Mich.	Mapes	Stafford
Dillon	Kelly, Pa.	Murdock	Stephens, Cal.
Esch	Kent	Nelson	Woodruff
Falconer	Lafferty	Nolan, J. I.	Young, N. Dak.
Farr	Lenroot	Norton
Fess	Lindbergh	Porter

The yeas on that measure were, as I have shown, 286 and the nays were 85, while 38 Republicans and Progressives went on record in favor of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. POU. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina assume to say that the currency bill that was finally enacted was the same bill that the gentleman refers to?

Mr. POU. Well, in all essential particulars. The gentleman knows, I think, that there were no very essential differences in it.

Mr. MADDEN. The only essential difference between the bill that passed the House and the bill that passed the Senate and was finally approved by the House was this, that if the House bill had become a law it would have put every business house in the United States into bankruptcy, while the bill that was finally passed in a very much modified form was approved by most of the men who had voted against the House bill originally.

Mr. POU. Yes; the same was said about the Reyburn bill, and yet only 12 were found willing to vote against it on a roll call. And the same was said about the trade commission bill, and on that we did not even have a roll call. We may therefore assume that nobody was opposed to it. I think our friends on the other side of the Chamber ought either stop criticizing these administration measures or stop voting for them.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I have very little time. There was one other point I wanted to bring out, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that nobody on either side of the House objected to the trade commission bill and nobody claimed that it would not be beneficial to the country, and no man can truthfully assert that such claim has been made.

Mr. POU. I know that the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have been making the welkin ring by charging that the Wilson administration was destroying the business of the country. You have had telegrams and letters read claiming that there is a general paralysis of business, and you have insisted that the country is going to the devil on account of the very legislation which some of you gentlemen have voted for.

Mr. MADDEN. As to most of those statements that the gentleman refers to I want to say they are true.

Mr. POU. Now, the other day Col. Roosevelt rose to remark that the foreign policy of Mr. Wilson's administration was laughed at in Europe. Well, the world has had long experience with European diplomacy. European diplomacy did not stop the Balkan war. It did not stop the murder of 40,000 or 50,000 Christians and Armenians purely on account of their religion. It did not stop the disastrous war in South Africa. Spion Kop and other bloody battlefields tell of the success of European diplomacy as applied to South Africa. Mr. Wilson's administration has been trying to avert the necessity of armed intervention by this country in Mexico. It would have been an easy matter to have involved this country in war and to have had our soldiers shot down and brought back dead. I think the diplomacy of Mr. Wilson's administration and his foreign policies will compare favorably with European diplomacy. I suppose the distinguished ex-President thinks we ought to be at war with Mexico right now. For me, I would prefer to have the foreign policies of this administration ridiculed if a contrary policy would involve this country in a bloody war with our neighbor, Mexico.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is all I care to contribute to the gaiety of the nations to-day. In examining the record vote on these measures it seemed to me if there is anything wrong with this legislation the responsibility is, in a measure, over there as much as it is over here. I will not pause to make any comments upon the patriotism of any man who constantly is predicting panic and financial disaster to bring about the success of any political party. I hope that there is no man in this Chamber who has so little patriotism that he would be willing to see ruin and disaster come to the country in order that any political party—I care not what its name is—may come back into power. And yet sometimes one is almost persuaded that such is the case. If these measures for which the administration is pressing are just, if the legislation is righteous, there is an unprejudiced jury which will pass upon the question in November. That jury has the good of the country at heart and is made up of the rank and file of the American people. With perfect confidence this administration will appeal to that jury. Upholding the administration in a solid vote on this side of the aisle; upholding the administration, sustaining it, in pressing for the passage of these measures, we find many of the opposite parties who put principle above party allegiance.

No bad measure would be supported in this way. It must be that these measures are so righteous that they deserve not only the solid support of the Democratic Party in this Congress, but that they received because they deserved support from every political party which has representation here. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] wishes me to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, on the 1st day of February, 1910, by the favor of a generous constituency of the sixth district of Missouri, I was elected to membership of the House of Representatives of the American Congress, succeeding a man of marked ability, a resident of Bates County, Mo., elected for 10 successive terms, giving to his district the benefit of ripe experience resulting from long service, which lasted nearly 19 years, his useful career having been cut short by his untimely death. During the short period of my service here in Congress, by reason of long-drawn-out sessions and repeated extra sessions, called for extraordinary legislation desired by the country, I have remained almost constantly at the seat of government, being permitted to see little of those whom I was elected to serve, because my duties required my attention in Washington.

During the short period that I have been permitted to serve a loyal people, the country has witnessed and gone through a political revolution not yet completed. The special election that gave me place here was fought out on the lines of the tariff.

The Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, the indorsement of the Taft administration, and what was known as Cannonism were the active issues. The result of that remarkable contest revealed the beginning of a new era in the politics of our country. It was the first evidence of protest at the polls against existing political conditions. The Payne-Aldrich law was obnoxious to the large majority of the people and was believed to be written in the interest of monopoly and in plain disregard of the wants of the consuming public, and was wiped from the Federal statute book by Democratic effort and Progressive Republican aid, and a lower tariff—the Underwood "tariff-for-revenue" law—substituted in its stead. President Taft was swept into political oblivion and Speaker Cannon retired from his high place and returned to private life.

As a result of this political revolution the Democratic Party rode triumphant into power. The once proud and arrogant Republican majority was dethroned and became a small minority in these halls; both branches of Congress became Democratic; the Republican Party, torn asunder, split into two factions bitterly antagonistic to each other. A new condition was ushered in; the great power, once so arbitrarily used, of naming all the committees of the House was taken from the Speaker, who was no longer permitted to control the House with despotic power, but his powers were limited largely to the ordinary powers of a presiding officer, and this great office has since been filled by a great Missourian, a great historian, a philosopher, a great character, loved by the entire membership of this House, an eminently fair and just presiding officer, in the person of CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri. [Applause.]

And what has been the result? The disrupted and once arrogant Republican Party, broken upon the rocks of political defeat, gave place to a triumphant and united Democratic Party, that has endeavored to keep faith with the American people. The country witnesses to-day with a glad heart a great Democrat as the Chief Magistrate of our wonderful country. A strong, courageous, clear-headed, and determined President is striving with wonderful ability to represent the best thought and wishes of the American people; and Woodrow Wilson has to-day the confidence of the people of the United States, as with a strong heart and a clear brain he seeks to do the will of all the people who love the Government and our common country. [Applause.]

What are the accomplishments of this Democratic administration brought about by the efforts of a great Democrat in the White House and the continuous labor and earnest efforts of the Democratic majorities in both branches of Congress? The House is presided over by Speaker CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri; the Senate is presided over by Vice President MARSHALL, of Indiana; a great Democrat is in the White House; a just tariff law has been written upon the statute books of the Nation; an income tax is being collected from the men of large incomes and all business corporations to help bear the burdens of Government; sugar freed from tax comes more abundantly into the home; a large free list for the necessities of daily use for the consumers of the land; and a lower tariff wall for imports, bringing competition and weakening the hand of monopoly.

A great currency problem has been worked out and is being put in operation to break the power of the Money Trust and to lessen the influence of Wall Street; to distribute the money of the people for the benefit of all and destroy the control thereof by a centralized money power; to make many money centers, from which the blood of commerce may flow into all avenues of trade and into all homes of the land; and to end congestion and centralization of the money of all the country in the great city of New York. The President and Congress served the people well in this great effort for a currency law that would decentralize the money of the Nation and would make many money centers instead of one.

BANK PANICS ARE NO LONGER FEARED.

Two constitutional amendments have been adopted during the brief four years I have been in Congress, one providing for an income tax, the other for the direct election of United States Senators, and Federal statutes enacted by Congress in reference thereto. One amendment to shift in a large measure the burdens of Federal taxation, the other to make more responsive to the will of the people the Senate of the United States, thereby tending to make it, like the House, a popular body and not the home of the millionaire or the agent of corporate wealth and special interests.

A Federal corrupt-practice act has been made the law of the land, seeking thereby, under severe penalties of fine and punishment, to prevent the corruption of the ballot and the purchase of seats in Congress, so that the halls of Congress shall be filled with honest representatives of a free and independent citizenship.

The physical valuation of railroads has been provided for and is now being made, to the end that these great properties and arteries of trade and commerce may be economically and honestly managed in the interest of all the people; that the issuance of watered stock may cease and be squeezed out, wherever possible; that overcapitalization may end; that the incomes of these great public-service corporations may not be longer diverted to build up the private fortunes of those who have operated and robbed the railroad properties so as to enhance private fortunes; to put an end to rebates for the benefit of favored shippers; to compel the using of the incomes of railroads for the improvement and betterment of the roadbeds and its service, for more reasonable rates for freight as well as passengers, so that the people who pay the rates and support the railroads and the employees who operate and labor upon the railroads may receive larger benefits and compensation for money and labor contributed, and so that robbery for private benefit may end.

A breaking up of monopoly and the putting of an end to the domination by special interests of our public-service corporations and other industries for excessive private gain, to the injury of the public welfare, is earnestly sought to be accomplished by Democratic effort. A better condition awaits the country by reason of Democratic success. The grip of corporate greed has been weakened, the strength of monopoly has been broken, respect for law has been increased, the masses of the people encouraged to renewed effort for relief; but the struggle for political health must go on. There can be no permanent relief without continued effort. The interest of the people must not abate, the hands of those who have helped to bring about these conditions must be held up and strengthened, or else there is no reward for honest service. Special interests are always alert and active, seeking to punish those who have weakened their power. Intrenched monopoly ever reaches out for more power and never ceases in its efforts. Let the people be jealously active and ever watchful, in order that the public may retain what it has now and may recover more that is its due. There can be no halting of effort by those who would preserve for the people all that is justly due them. The Democratic Party has spoken its wishes in platform declarations, and a sincere effort is being made to keep these platform promises.

The work is not yet complete. Hasty legislation should not be desired. Careful consideration should be given to the enactment of laws that are to affect the welfare of nearly a hundred millions of people. And yet legislation should not be unduly delayed, but hastened, as far as practicable, to the end that criticism may not be deserved.

Criticism will abound, for such is human nature, and the public man must bear with patience the criticism, whether just or unjust, whether from friend or from foe.

The patient work he performs and the daily service he may render his constitutents he may not receive credit for; the good he does may be overlooked or forgotten; the laws beneficial that he may help to enact may not be put to his credit, but his mistakes and omissions will not be overlooked by those who desire to displace him.

No man should expect laws to be enacted to interfere with the law of supply and demand. All men know that abundant crops lower the price of farm products, and the demand for and scarcity thereof enhances the value of said products. Laws should not be enacted to interfere with natural laws, but in aid thereof. Tariff laws that build a wall around a country, save for revenue purposes in support of the legitimate needs of the Government, should no more be tolerated than walled cities, as of old.

The advocates of the Underwood "tariff-for-revenue" law did not promise to increase the price of the products of the farm or factory, a surplus of which are shipped abroad, but it contemplates lower prices in protected articles to be purchased by farmers and other consumers of manufactured articles that have been unduly protected and prices raised by reason of high tariff walls and monopoly aided thereby. An enlarged free list given by the Underwood bill was demanded by the farmers and other consumers of manufactured products. Those who predicted dire disaster by the enactment into law of the Democratic tariff-for-revenue bill have seen their prophecies unfulfilled. What producer of wool, now on the free list, will complain of the enhanced price of his product? What consumer of sugar, getting more pounds for the dollar by reason of the tariff being taken off, would have the tariff restored? The prices of cattle and hogs are high and will continue to be high as long as the demand is large and the supply limited. An ever-increasing population calls for more food products. Who is there bold enough to oppose an income tax, provided by the Underwood bill? Who would relieve the corporations, given special privileges by law, from their fair share of taxation? Who would substitute the discarded Payne-Aldrich tariff law for the present law, that shelters no monopoly and yet provides sufficient revenue for all the needs of the Government? Some changes in the law may be needed. After a fair trial they will be provided. Experience furnishes the test of every law.

The laws on other subjects were also promised in Democratic platforms.

A bill has passed the lower House of Congress providing for Federal aid for public roads, and is now pending in the Senate. A comprehensive law providing for rural credits is now being constructed by Congress, to the end that lower rates of interest may be provided for those who offer lands for security. We hope shortly to see a farmers' credit bill a part of the law of the land and expect its passage by Congress during this term.

Legislation has been enacted restricting the powers of the Federal courts and their jurisdiction lessened, and Federal judges are less arrogant than heretofore. Articles of impeachment have been preferred by Congress; some of them convicted and removed, others forced to resign; their powers curtailed and further restrictions are being pressed for enactment. However, it will not be complete until life tenure is stricken down, and I hope that in the early future the joint resolution proposed by me to amend the Constitution so that the terms of circuit and district United States judges shall be limited to not exceeding a term of 10 years may pass Congress and be submitted to the States for constitutional amendment, and that these judges shall be elected or appointed in such manner as Congress shall, by law, direct. When this amendment shall have been adopted and the terms of Federal judges limited by law, Federal courts will regard the public welfare as never before.

Three great antitrust measures are now pending before Congress. The passage of this antitrust legislation at this session is earnestly desired by the President, and it is the main part of his present program, specially recommended for passage and enactment into law before adjournment, so that the business world and the country may not longer be kept in suspense as to the rules of conduct prescribed by law that shall govern and control big business. Better be settled now than be kept in abeyance and leave uncertain the things that business ought to know with as little delay as possible. Such is the expressed wish of the President. Such is the desire of the majority of Congress. Such is the demand of the country. It was promised by platform declaration, and faith must be kept.

These bills have already been passed by the House and are now pending in and awaiting the action of the Senate, and the House remains in session waiting for the passage of these measures by the Senate and their return to the House, when amended, so that they may become a law during this session of Congress.

This legislation is promised by Democratic platform declaration. These three bills, passed by overwhelming majorities in the House after full discussion, are fresh in the recollection of the House and the country, and need no special mention at this time. We await the action of the Senate.

They are what are known as the Covington bill, being a bill to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes; a bill by virtue of which the acts, business methods, and practices of corporations may be annually reported and secured for purposes of legislation and control.

Second, the Clayton bill, being a bill to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes. This proposed law seeks to prevent monopoly in trade and commerce and to protect legitimate business and fair competition from the control and domination of great corporations and trust concerns, that have sought to control all the business of the country for their selfish purposes, a bill to help stay the hand of corporate greed and save the toiling masses from undue oppression, a bill in the interest of honest competition and for the protection of local dealers and against monopoly in any commodity anywhere.

The third antitrust measure, known as the Rayburn bill, is a bill seeking to control the issuance of stocks and bonds of corporations and to prohibit common or interlocking directorates and management, and providing for fines and penalties in violation thereof.

I have already spoken on an amendment offered by me to one of these trust bills—the Clayton antitrust bill. I need not make further reference now to the merits of these bills, for the passage of which some of us are spending the summer here, when we would be glad to be in our districts and looking after those ambitious gentlemen who, with industrious activity and by every known method of modern politics, seek to exhibit their virtues and lessen the confidence of the voter in the sitting Member of Congress. Some Members would be glad to be in their districts, where much poison is being planted and where noxious weeds are being grown from foul seeds that have been sown, and by their presence among their constituents for a brief while, to offset and lessen the damage done, by in a measure properly responding to those who, in their overzealous desire for place, have not hesitated to plant many false impressions and by widespread misstatements have sought an undue advantage, as against the man whose sense of duty keeps him here.

The Congressman who stays on his job and is not stricken down by his constituency because he fails to canvass his district in his own interest, when he can not go back and meet his people face to face because of conditions here, will be the more grateful if his public conduct is approved in his absence. During the brief time that I have been in Congress this has been my summer resort. Four summers have I spent here in this Capital City of the Nation, here at a low altitude, almost on a level with the sea, where a humid atmosphere makes the heat more oppressive and through which the rays of a hot summer's sun pour in the daytime down upon asphalt pavement and upon brick and stone, and when night comes they give back into the atmosphere the heat absorbed by day, making the night both hot and oppressive.

President Wilson in his Fourth of July address at Philadelphia was appreciative when he said that—

> The Members of the House and Senate who stay in hot Washington to maintain a quorum of the Houses and transact public business are performing an act of patriotism. I honor them for it, and I am mighty glad to stay there and stick by them till it is over.

Only those who are here in daily attendance can fully appreciate all the conditions that surround the individual Member who stays here from a sense of duty, though he would love to look into the face of his constituents and to grasp again the friendly hand that has helped him; but there is an abiding thought that he can afford to trust those who gave him place and who desire that he shall remain here in discharge of his duty as long as necessary to aid the President and Congress in the enactment of legislation promised and desired by the people.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, for the purpose of printing a statement by Mr. ANDREW J. PETERS, a Representative in Congress, which appeared in the Boston Sunday Post of June 14, 1914.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, for the purpose indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. On what subject?

Mr. MANN. On the subject of politics—statesmanship, a subject foreign to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it is on the first subject, it is superfluous. [Laughter.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear on what subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois says on the subject of politics—statesmanship.

Mr. DONOVAN. Well, the gentleman talks so little that I shall not object. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago, in the course of some remarks relative to the influence of the Executive upon the legislative body, I referred to two instances where the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had stated as an argument to the House the wishes of the President of the United States. The gentleman from Alabama thought I was mistaken in my recollection. Now, of course, it is a matter of very slight importance whether I was mistaken or not, for I recognize that the memory of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is doubtless quite as good as mine; but it happened that I had been impressed when the gentleman from Alabama spoke by what seemed to me a very extraordinary argument, so I was quite sure that I was correct; and I have looked at the RECORD to corroborate my memory, and I have found the two instances to which I referred. I mention this, not, of course, as any reflection on the lack of memory of the gentleman from Alabama, for the leader of the House, who is constantly obliged to take the floor, can not be expected to remember every argument he has ever used, but merely because of the illustration of the principle which I think it gives. On the 15th of October last, when the question was up whether the House should adjourn from day to day, I find that the gentleman from Alabama remarked:

> The President of the United States has asked me, representing this side of the House, not to agree to an adjournment until the currency bill can be passed in the Senate or some satisfactory arrangement made.

The other instance to which I referred was the occasion of the passage of the resolution relative to sending troops to Mexico. I find that the gentleman said:

> I would not insist upon the immediate consideration of this resolution and its going through to-night if it were not for the fact that the President of the United States himself has stated that it is of the utmost importance to the Nation that it should be passed.

Since then other gentlemen have suggested to me that they have heard other similar remarks. As I say, the corroborating of a man's memory is of little consequence, but I wish to cite these as surprising indications and confirmations of the opinion which is abroad in the country that the executive power is encroaching upon the legislative, and that this Congress is largely an echo of the wishes of the other end of the Avenue. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] himself stated that he recognized the importance of the independence of the executive and the legislative branches, and that makes still more impressive the fact that he, the leader of the House, should think it necessary to use as an argument the wishes of the Executive. He knew the body he was addressing. He knew what argument would appeal to the Democratic side.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-five Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. DONOVAN. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from New York to make a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, you have said there was not a quorum present and have directed the Clerk to call the roll.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Connecticut is out of order. I have moved that the committee rise. If the gentleman from Connecticut will stop interfering by his useless objections, we will make more progress. I ask that my motion be put.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise is in order whether there is a quorum present or not. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee now rise.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 45.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee and Mr. FITZGERALD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 8 ayes and 65 noes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will note as present and not voting the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. DONOVAN, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. ROUSE. That makes 75, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAMSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 17824, the general deficiency bill, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and 224 Members had answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy and the nonpartisanship of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN], who is filibustering against his own side of the House, and then waits until his colleagues on that side have finished their remarks and makes his point of no quorum in the middle of one of my sentences.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I hope the distinguished Member from Massachusetts will not have those thoughts engrossed and framed and hung up in the great galleries of this country, because it is not worthy of such a great mind as the gentleman from Massachusetts has. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the most of what the gentleman from Connecticut said, but I do not think I lost anything by that. [Laughter.]

Now, to resume, Mr. Chairman. When the gentleman interrupted me I was commenting on the significance of the argument which the gentleman from Alabama made about the President's wishes. I know that the gentleman, as he suggested at the time, does his own thinking. I know that he has his own opinions, that he knows the arguments which can be made on any subject, and that no man will more masterfully present them. But the gentleman from Alabama also knows his fellow Members on that side of the House. He knows the arguments that will most appeal to them, and therefore it is peculiarly significant that he should use the President's wishes as arguments to accomplish what he desires.

I appreciate that no Congress has been more earnest in the pursuit of patronage, of what are called spoils, than this Congress. I appreciate that the President is the dispenser of patronage, and so I appreciate what a powerful argument that would be as addressed to that side of the House; but I still think it very unfortunate that this increasing and encroaching influence from the White House should be so illustrated.

The gentleman from Alabama, I remember a few years ago, published in one of the magazines, I think the Forum, an article upon the dangers of Executive patronage, and I would call that to his attention. I think we are having more illustrations of that danger during the present Congress than we have had for many years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not believe that any situation exists at all parallel to what there was in the administration prior to the one just before this one?

Mr. GILLETT. Indeed, I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows that for several years, as far as Congress was concerned, it had no independent thought or action. It simply waited until the ukase went out from the White House and the big stick was flourished and then it rapidly acquiesced in whatever was proposed.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, on the contrary, the gentleman will find many instances in the case he has in mind where the leaders on this side of the House openly broke from the influences and desires of the White House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and those leaders are now discredited and were retired from public life, because they were recognized as hostile to the public interests. That is one of the reasons why the Democratic Party has been put into power.

Mr. GILLETT. That may well be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A little coterie on that side of the House, hostile to the best interests of the people, set themselves up in independence of those who were attempting to represent the interests of the people. The purpose of those leaders was to defeat legislation which the country desired. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's sarcasm I recognize, and I recognize also how far from a fair portraiture of conditions it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, it is not sarcasm. I regret that the cold, naked truth has such a disturbing effect upon the gentleman from Massachusetts; but somebody must speak the truth on occasions, however much it may be distasteful to gentlemen on that side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. There were no such instances during that administration of increasingly breaking down of civil-service laws as there has been during this Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I recollect that during the period in mind the customary thing was to send three Executive orders at one time to the Civil Service Commission, one exempting a place, the other naming the man for it, and a third covering the place back into the classified service. [Laughter.] However much the gentleman may criticize this administration, no one in it ever had the presumption to attempt to rival in that respect the distinguished civil-service reformer in the White House previous to President Taft.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is utterly unfair in that, because that question was brought up and thoroughly discussed here at the time. Charges were made then such as the gentleman now makes, and they were thoroughly discussed, and it was shown that the exemptions which were made were made in the interest of the service and not in the interest of patronage.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is not as well informed as he might be. I am speaking of cases of which I have personal knowledge. I know a case, for instance, where a distinguished resident of Brooklyn——

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, I do not care to have the gentleman make his speech at this time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to put this one in the RECORD—where a distinguished resident of Brooklyn who had been an active Republican, a former Member of this House, had served actively in the Republican ranks, and after he left the House was appointed to a certain position. After a time it was covered into the classified service. Later he got out of harmony with the dominant forces in the Republican organization in the State of New York. He did not go along as docilely as desired, and so President Roosevelt took the place out of the classified service and put in a much more useful, docile, and servile member of the Republican organization at the request of the then distinguished Senator from the State of New York, the well-known and famous civil-service reformer, the late Thomas C. Platt. [Laughter.] Can the gentleman cite a single act of the Executive during this administration relative to the civil service that in any way would approach the degradation of the civil service practiced in the case to which I have referred?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know as to these facts, and I have suspicions as to the accuracy of the gentleman's statement, because it was not necessary to take the case out of the civil service in order to drop a man.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was not necessary to do so to drop him.

Mr. GILLETT. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But that was not what was of chief interest. They were anxious to take care of a particularly useful member of the organization.

Mr. GILLETT. What was the office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The office was that of shipping commissioner of the port of New York. The gentleman removed was a former Member of this House, Mr. Hanbury, of Brooklyn, and the gentleman placed in the office was Capt. Dickey, of Newburgh.

I have the facts, I have the names, I have the locations, and I know the political exigency that made Col. Roosevelt forget, at least temporarily, his long professions of interest in the advancement of civil service in order to secure the helpful cooperation of a very distinguished political mechanician in the State of New York. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know anything about that instance. I do not know that I ever heard of it before.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman knows about it now.

Mr. GILLETT. I do remember this: That some such charges as the gentleman has made were brought up in this House and were thoroughly discussed. I remember I, among others, went at that time and investigated the charges which had been made. I was satisfied that the charges fell to the ground upon investigation and that the then President had lived strictly and honestly up to his professions about civil service. I will say that I believe he has done more for the civil service and the merit system in the United States than any other one man. It is just possible, though I am sorry to believe it, that he made exceptions. I was not aware of them during his service. I was not aware of the case the gentleman stated, and, therefore, of course, I can not defend him; but it is a great surprise to me if he did, and I am sure there is some good explanation of it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, it occurred to me when the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was asking whether we knew of any cases in the present administration that I would like to ask him if he has investigated the publicity bureau which they have in the Agricultural Department, where they are now employing some 20 men to get out publicity articles, and if he is familiar with the fact of their issuing a notice for men to take the civil-service examination for those places, and if he is aware of the fact that after having taken an examination in each instance they took special favorites and put them there?

I will say to the gentleman that I am going to introduce a resolution in a few days to investigate that advertising bureau, but I call the gentleman's attention to the fact now that they have some 20 men employed down there in the Agricultural Department contrary to the law; that they are drawing salaries; that they have been placed on the various rolls, and that it is a sham roll that they have made up, and that they are taken out of the different departments and they are down there employed for that particular purpose, absolutely in violation of the civil-service law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say this to the gentleman from Washington——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I hope the gentleman will investigate, and he will find out where there is need for some explanation.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). That the peculiar makeup of the gentleman's topography—if that expression properly expresses what I have in mind—enables him to talk more easily through his hat than any other man in this House. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And that perhaps accounts for a great many of the statements he has been making about the Democratic Party. There is a statute which prohibits certain things being done relative to publicity agents, and certain other things are permitted. One is the preparation of material for distribution equally relative to the activities of the department to the press. None is employed in the Department of Agriculture in violation of the civil-service law. The gentleman is mistaken, and I might add that if the gentleman introduces a resolution to investigate the activities of the Agricultural Department, so far as its publicity activities are concerned, he will probably not get a dozen votes on that side of the House, and probably not a dozen on this——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would not get any over there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That department has always been a special favorite of the House. The House is interested in what it is doing and desires that department to do what it is doing. But I was not discussing the publicity business of the Department of Agriculture. I am talking about an eminent civil-service reformer.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman why that publicity is not in violation of the civil service. The gentleman challenged us awhile ago to point it out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not. Let the gentleman get statements of fact and put them before the House and they will be just as completely repudiated as his statements about the shipping of pig iron and steel products from Europe into the district of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], a pure figment of the imagination. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, the gentleman from Oregon——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, get me in the right State.

Mr. FITZGERALD. From Washington has become the official "S O S" of the Republican Party [laughter on the Democratic side], and signals of distress are constantly being sounded by him. There is nothing in sight whatever to indicate as to when his task will be finished. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, I notice I usually get a rise out of that side; I have not failed yet.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The gentleman is like the wasp—nobody desires to permit it to linger and sting, but it is brushed aside and killed at the earliest opportunity. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, to come back to a more substantial argument——

Mr. GILLETT. It could easily be more substantial.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe that if the gentleman from Massachusetts will take the trouble to examine carefully the record of former President Roosevelt and his civil-service activities and reforms, as he has the record he has just been reading from, he will ascertain that as a civil-service reformer, Col. Roosevelt is like the character in a play recently staged, who announced that he was a reformer, that he favored reform, but he first wanted the satisfaction of having fallen so low that there might be the greater enjoyment in the reformation. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, that attack is preposterous and absurd [laughter on the Democratic side], and if the gentleman from New York attacks President Roosevelt on civil service I can assure him it will have very little effect——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me ask the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, I am a civil-service reformer myself. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. I notice the gentleman says that with a smile, and it excites a smile.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It seems to arouse a lot of amusement; but I have consistently voted in favor of placing positions in the classified service and against exempting positions from the classified service. President Roosevelt can not make any such statement about his record. I know other cases, and I may mention them, if the gentleman provokes me sufficiently [laughter on the Democratic side], in his career which I could give to the House; and without the possibility of contradiction I assert that he never hesitated to permit his convictions or professions about the civil service to prevent him putting into office any man whom he thought could be of use to further his political interests. He took places out of the classified service and removed men, regardless of their qualifications, in order to make room for men he wanted to use politically, and I can prove it.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman says he can state that without contradiction. I contradict it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts is not authorized to speak on behalf of or act for Col. Roosevelt on any political matter, and would be repudiated if he attempted to do so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. That is quite possible.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I do not.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to denounce it as false. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GILLETT. It is quite possible, but that does not change my opinion of his conduct, and while the gentleman has propounded a question about a certain case which I can not answer because I know nothing about it, yet, when he says President Roosevelt never hesitated to put in one of his supporters and was constantly hampering the civil-service law, I know that the gentleman is wrong, because that very question was brought up and discussed and investigated here in this House, and those who made that assertion were proven to be wrong. There is this distinction moreover between that administration and this. If that administration did make any exceptions, they were exceptions of a few individuals. This administration is making them by companies and platoons.

You do not limit your exceptions to any one case. You have excepted in a number of different laws whole classes, and your President apparently means to keep up with you, despite his civil-service records and professions.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Not now. He has recently issued this Executive order:

Schedule A, subdivision XI, section 3, of the civil-service rules is hereby amended to read as follows:

"3. Commercial agents, experts, and special agents to investigate trade conditions abroad and in the United States, including the insular possessions, with the object of promoting the foreign commerce of the United States, including experts and special agents employed upon the field work of investigating the cost of production at home and abroad.

"WOODROW WILSON.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, July 2, 1914."

There is a whole class exempted. Apparently he does not wait for the legislative bill, which creates a class of men with salaries aggregating $100,000, who are by the law creating them excepted from the civil service, but, as if to publish his approval in advance and lead the procession, the President exempts all commercial agents.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been led far afield from the question I began to discuss, which was the constant increase of the influence of the Executive under this administration. Yet I will say for myself that while I believe it is most unfortunate that the legislative branch should allow itself to be influenced by the Executive, yet in the present instance I believe it is for the public good, for I believe that the President of the United States is much wiser and safer than the Democratic majority in Congress. And whereas the increase of Executive influence is a most unfortunate tendency, yet personally I believe, in most cases, that in the dissensions and differences between the Executive and the legislative, the Executive has been much more likely to be right than the legislative. I would gladly prefer, as long as we are for our sins to be punished by a Democratic administration and Congress, to trust the President in the White House than the Congress at the Capitol. Of course, you may say it is inconsistent to first criticize the increase of Executive influence and then say that you like the result, but they are both of them unfortunate. They are both of them evils. I regret both, but of the two I will confess I think in its immediate result it is much better that this Executive should encroach upon this Congress. I hope we will soon be rid of both, and both dangers eradicated.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. Does the gentleman think the banking and currency bill as it came from the President's hands was a much better piece of legislation than it was after it had passed even the Democratic caucus or the Democratic majority?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not wish to go into details or individual cases. I do not mean that the President is right as against the House in every instance. In fact, I think they are both of them wrong most of the time, but as a rule I prefer the judgment of the President to that of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, it is not a pleasant duty for a Member to call attention to violations of law by officials whose sworn duty it is to enforce the law. But while we are considering a great appropriation bill, it seems to me that it is not inappropriate for Congress to know how some of the money which we are appropriating is being used by those who have charge of its administration. I refer, gentlemen, to the Revenue-Cutter Service. We appropriate every year about $2,500,000 for this great service. It was first instituted to enforce the revenue laws of the United States, to prevent smuggling of foreign goods into this country, and to-day we have a great fleet under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a notorious fact that every Friday, or thereabouts, at this time of the year the revenue cutter Prairie leaves Boston, comes to Washington, and is loaded with Democratic officials, and they are taken for a cruise down the Potomac at Government expense. But that would not be so bad if the violation of the law stopped there. I have here the Washington Post of July 6, 1914, from which I want to read the following dispatch:

[Special to the Washington Post.]

MATTAPOISETT, MASS., July 5, 1914.

William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, and Mrs. McAdoo arrived at their summer home here to-day.

They came on the revenue cutter Onondaga.

Charles S. Hamlin, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and his guest, Assistant Secretary Baldwin, who were in Mattapoisett for the Fourth, left to-day for Washington.

Mr. Chairman, the statute of the United States enacted in 1884 provides:

And hereafter revenue cutters shall be used exclusively for public service and in no way for private purposes.

On the 24th day of June Congress appropriated $475,000 to purchase two additional revenue cutters that will be added to this great fleet of pleasure craft for the Secretary of the Treasury and those to whom he may desire to extend the courtesy of violating the laws of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury is not responsible for this statute, but, Mr. Chairman, he is responsible for the administration of the laws so far as the revenue cutters are concerned.

Mr. Chairman, we have had in the past 10 years a period of law enactment. What we need to-day is a renaissance of law enforcement. How can the President of the United States expect the ordinary citizen to obey and respect the law when his Secretary of the Treasury violates the law with impunity? Public sentiment should demand the removal from office of every official whose sworn duty it is to enforce the law, but who refuses to enforce it. And if the public to-day had the power, in no uncertain terms it would demand the removal from office of the Secretary of the Treasury, who not only refuses to enforce this law but himself violates it. I commend him to the words of a great Republican, to those patriotic words of Abraham Lincoln:

Let every American, every lover of liberty, every well-wisher to his posterity swear by the blood of the Revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country and never to tolerate their violation by others. As the patriots of seventy-six did to support the Declaration of Independence, so to the support of the Constitution and laws let every American pledge his life, his property, and his sacred honor—let every man remember that to violate the law is to trample on the blood of his father and to tear the charter of his own and his children's liberty. Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, in spelling books, and in almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice. And, in short, let it become the political religion of the Nation; and let the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the grave and the gay of all sexes and tongues and colors and conditions sacrifice unceasingly upon its altars.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, above all let it be taught to-day to the Secretary of the Treasury, who violates the law with impunity.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ADAMSON). Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; I yield the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I simply want the gentleman to answer a question. Does the gentleman think that Secretary of War Taft violated the law when he went on an excursion to the Philippines with a lot of his friends and Members of Congress on a Government vessel? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. I know of no statute prohibiting the President of the United States to ride on a war vessel when he is at the head of the Army and Naval forces of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. He was Secretary of War, and he used a transport.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; and he was sent on public business to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But not on that excursion. There were several marriages contracted on that trip. It was a social affair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has used seven minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa and Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. GILLETT. He yields, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. I rose for recognition at the time the gentleman from Massachusetts yielded to the gentleman from Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] made a very caustic and unauthorized and untrue statement about the policy of a former President of the United States on the subject of the civil service, and when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] undertook to defend the former President and to challenge the statement, the gentleman from New York stated that the gentleman from Massachusetts had no right to defend the former President of the United States in that matter or in any other matter.

The gentleman from New York was wrong in that particular. Any gentleman on this floor who has respect for truth and for a true record of an administration such as was conducted by President Roosevelt has a right to rise on this floor and defend him against those charges; and I just want, in the three minutes I have, to read a tribute to his administration from an authority that is not politically aligned with President Roosevelt, but for whom, perhaps, the gentleman from New York has more or less regard. It is a tribute from Woodrow Wilson, the historian.

In Woodrow Wilson's Epochs of American History, in the volume entitled "Division and Reunion," the author pays a tribute to President Roosevelt which is about as emphatic in terms of commendation as can be found anywhere. A close perusal of these volumes will disclose the fact that it is much more commendatory than is accorded to any other President by the author, Woodrow Wilson. A special chapter is given to the subject "President Roosevelt's policies," and in that chapter a brief record of "certain more or less manifest results" are "ventured," as follows:

By the President's mediation in the great anthracite coal strike in October, 1902, the country was instructed to recognize that dangerous insolence of aggregated capital, that heedlessness of public rights, which is signified by the term "plutocracy"; by the successful prosecution by the Government of the Northern Securities case, in 1903, the Sherman Act was rescued from disuse and shown to be, if not itself an adequate or certain measure for dealing with great capitalistic combinations, yet a powerful weapon in the hands of the Executive with which to negotiate for such a measure from Congress; by the Elkins Act of 1905, and the prosecutions that have ensued under it, railroad rebating has been rendered a relatively unprofitable practice, attended with great risk; by the Hepburn Act the Interstate Commerce Commission has been recalled from failure and made a valuable administrative agency; by the investigation of the Chicago stockyards, the public were taught the value of publicity and the serviceability of government as an inquisitorial and informing agency; by the pure-food law, a scope of power over interstate commerce, not often hinted at before, was asserted successfully by the National Government; by the public-land policy of the administration, the responsibility of the present to future generations was emphasized as by its other policies the responsibility of capital to the community was insisted upon.

It has been sometimes urged against Mr. Roosevelt's administration that it failed of institutional progress along any definite line. However this may be, all must admit that the chief legacy of this remarkable administration to the people of the United States is one of ideas. Mr. Roosevelt brought to office, together with a thoroughly aggressive disposition to urge them, certain formulated notions. He believed that government, if informed and administered by experts, could be made an agency for the advancement of the community; he believed that there was still in the United States a large and, if properly led, dominant body of citizenship independent in its affiliations of either labor or capital; he believed in the Presidency as the natural and responsible, because sole, representative of that citizenship; and he believed, finally, in party as the necessary instrument of leadership.

He closes by saying:

One can recognize the validity of many of the criticisms that have been leveled against Mr. Roosevelt's administration and still agree with Gov. Hughes, of New York, in characterizing it as "an administration which has impressed the American people with the necessity for the correction of obvious evils and has stirred the American conscience."

Now, if that be true, if the statement of Woodrow Wilson be true in that particular, is it possible that the President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, violated all his ideals and all of his principles on civil service and prostituted that great cause to his political ends by appointing men whom he could use politically without regard for the public service, without regard to the public interest, but to further partisan political ends?

I think the gentleman from New York will be ashamed of his statement when he sees it in the RECORD, and I hope he will purge the RECORD of that statement.

President Roosevelt, he said, used his administration, used his power under the civil service, for his own political purposes. The gentleman from New York can not make good his statements. He can not offer the evidence or the proof.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is a new Member of this House.

If he were in politics long enough to walk on his own feet, he would not make the assertion that any statement that I make in this House is untrue. I neither make untrue statements nor do I so far violate the rules of the body of which I am a Member as to characterize the statements of others—I almost said "gentlemen," but I will say "Members"—as untrue. I suggest that the Representative from Washington continue his work of reading the writings of Woodrow Wilson. The more he reads of President Wilson's works the more information he will obtain, the better qualified he will be to perform his public duties, and the more likely to form a correct estimation of what is proper in a Representative in this body.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has been criticizing the present administration for its actions in connection with the civil service. Recently a statement appeared as to the character of the exemptions made by the President of the United States, in the exercise of his authority under the civil-service rules. A knowledge of the President's action will be valuable and instructive and will be approved by every unbiased and impartial critic. Men who have been injured while at work in the governmental service; widows formerly in the classified service, whose husbands, after years of faithful service, had died, have been appointed or reinstated without examination, and some persons who had for long years served in some minor capacity as messengers have recently, by Executive order, been promoted to such positions as unskilled laborers, so as to obtain a slight additional compensation.

I have personal knowledge of some of these acts by this administration. A resident of my district was employed by the Army engineers on river and harbor work. He was an engineer, and had charge of a hoisting engine. Without negligence on his part, as the result of an accident to the apparatus, he lost an arm, so that he could no longer follow his occupation of engineer. He was in sound physical condition, a man about 53 years of age, possessed of an ordinary school education. He could not get private employment, because no one would employ a man with but one arm. He sought employment among private enterprises as a watchman or messenger, but the fact that he was disabled prevented him from obtaining employment. He sought an opportunity to take the civil-service examination, so that he might qualify for a position as messenger in the departmental service, but the Civil Service Commission declined to permit him to take an examination because of the physical defect—the loss of an arm, without fault on his part and while engaged in the governmental service. Here was a man 52 or 53 years of age, sound physically, with the exception that he had lost an arm in the governmental service; of fair education, competent to pass an examination, refused employment in private life, forbidden to take the civil-service examinations for employment by the Government, anxiously seeking an opportunity to earn his livelihood, and finding every door closed to him. That such a situation should exist in our civilization seems inpossible; to permit it to continue would be intolerable.

The facts were presented to the President of the United States. The record was referred to the Army engineers in charge of the work where this man had been employed. Upon a report from them that this man had been an industrious, sober, faithful, and competent employee, that he had lost his arm as the result of an accident for which he was not at fault, President Wilson issued an order that he might be appointed in the Federal service as a messenger, without examination, wherever there might be need for his services. Afterwards the head of one of the departments appointed him to such a position. That act and similar acts by the President are now criticized and condemned as a violation of the underlying principles of the civil-service law.

Mr. GILLETT. Of course nobody——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Such action is only what should be expected of a humane man in the White House. With such a record before him, with the power given to him under the law, how could he do otherwise than give this man an opportunity to support himself and his wife and three or four dependent children by employment in the Federal service in a position for which he was fully qualified?

Or take the case of the widow of some Government employee, who before her marriage had been employed in the departmental service. After years of married life with some employee in the Federal Government, who had rendered faithful and efficient service in an inconspicuous place and then passed away, why should she be deprived of the opportunity to return to that service? Who would insist that she be compelled to qualify through the medium of an examination, if her capacity had previously been established? Who can criticize the Executive for permitting such a woman to return without examination to a position similar to the one which she had formerly occupied in the Government service? Are such acts to be condemned for mere political effect, as violations of the civil-service law?

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman seems to intimate that I condemn those acts. Of course I do not condemn them. I believe nobody condemns them. But does the gentleman bring up a praiseworthy case like that as any answer to this exemption of whole classes for patronage purposes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman may not in specific terms have condemned these acts, but he was condemning the action of the Chief Executive for his raid upon the civil service, his violation of the civil-service law, his prostitution of the authority given him under the law, for the purpose of providing places in the Government without examination. Mr. Chairman, I should be willing to stake my reputation on the statement that the great majority of the exemptions made by President Wilson since he has been in office has been of the character I have described. I have watched with some care what has been done, and I have stated the facts.

The gentleman refers to the recent action of the President in exempting from examination the commercial attachés or agents who are to be appointed to promote the foreign commerce of the United States. The Secretary of Commerce, before the Committee on Appropriations, advocated such legislation. I believe that his position was absolutely sound. He wishes, for instance, to obtain a man to send to South America to make an investigation of the boot and shoe trade in some of the South American countries. He said—and I believe his contention to be correct—that the man who would be of any value to the United States is not the man who may be successful in passing an examination in reading, rhetoric, grammar, higher mathematics, ancient history, botany, or some other similar subjects which may not be familiar to those citizens of the United States who are familiar with the shoe trade, but what is needed is a man who knows the boot and shoe trade, who knows its history and its development, who has some knowledge of the trade in the particular country to which he is to be sent, as well as the language of the country, and is of such a presentable appearance that his services will be of some value.

Men are needed to investigate the woolen and worsted business abroad, the extension of trade in cotton goods and other articles of American manufacture. The character and type of men desired can not be best obtained through a civil-service examination. Such men must be taken from the trade; they must be familiar with the trade, its technique, and its development and extension. To be of real value they must be known to those who are to make use of their reports and rely upon them. Men will not do who will be sufficiently interested only to draw the salary attached to the place and be without other ambition or greater capacity than is required to draw the salary. I do not believe that the charges as to the prostitution of the civil service by this administration can be sustained. I do not believe that the facts justify them. So far——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman has illustrated his ability to defend the administration very effectively——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not defending the administration. I am telling the truth about the administration, and the truth is always its own defense.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman has demonstrated his ability to defend the administration against the charges made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] just made a charge against an official of this Government that, if true, amounts to a malfeasance in office. Personally, I have a very high estimate of the man who presides over the Treasury Department, and I am not inclined to believe the charge made against him can be true. Having great confidence in the gentleman's knowledge of what goes on with relation to governmental matters, I should like to have him tell us what the facts are in relation to the charge made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. To me it is a very much more important matter than the question of the violation of the civil-service law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, Mr. Chairman, it is an extraordinary request to ask me to explain what there may be in charges made by partisan Republicans against a Democratic administration.

Mr. CANTOR. Partisan newspapers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is asking me to perform a remarkable and peculiar service. I have no knowledge of any facts upon which these charges have been made. Gentlemen base them upon certain reports in newspapers and certain reports of the movements of different persons. I have been sufficiently long in public life to lead me to the conclusion that it is not always wise to place too much reliance upon what one reads in the public press. If anyone has violated any law to such an extent that he is guilty of malfeasance in office, there is a remedy. One of the valuable things about our system of Government is that we provide remedies for such things. But may it not be possible that certain officials of the Treasury Department, in the performance of some of the multifarious duties imposed upon them, have been required to go aboard revenue cutters and to go from one place to another on them to perform properly imperative official duties? Is it wise or safe for anyone to take as a proper characterization of the purpose of such journeys the statements that may be made about them in the public prints?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will permit me, what he has just said might be considered as an inquiry to me, inasmuch as I propounded the question that the gentleman is answering. I want to say to him that I am quite in accordance with what he says. I have too high a regard for this official to believe that this can be true; but I thought perhaps the gentleman was in possession of the facts, and that he could answer the charge of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am in possession of no facts which would justify me in the belief that any Democratic official in this administration is guilty in the slightest degree of the violation of any law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have not hesitated when I have had information that I have believed was reliable about officials overstepping the limits of their authority to discharge my public duty as a Representative by free criticism of them. In this case I have no information that would justify such action. It seems to me from my knowledge of the extent of the functions of the Treasury Department, of the multitudinous duties imposed upon the department by law, of the necessity of high officials keeping somewhat close scrutiny of those under them, that it is not only likely but quite probable that it has been essential for the Secretary of the Treasury and some of his assistants at various times to travel on revenue cutters in the performance of their duties.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman name some of the duties that might devolve on the Secretary of the Treasury which would cause him to use a revenue cutter leaving New York Harbor with the American flag flying, and immediately after it was outside of the harbor the Secretary ordering the flag to be pulled down, and its remaining down until they reached the port in Massachusetts where his summer home is—can the gentleman tell us what public duties would cause such an act as that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would have to suppose that that happened.

Mr. GOOD. Well, the gentleman can suppose that it did happen.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course I can suppose it, but it would be quite an effort to do so. I live in a seaport town and I am somewhat familiar with maritime matters. My recollection is that the flag is raised on vessels while they are in port and is lowered when the port is left. I am not familiar with the regulations, but that is my recollection. However, I shall venture this assertion, that the Secretary of the Treasury, while on a revenue cutter, never suggested any action relative to the flag, or knew or had any knowledge of the raising or lowering of the flag, unless it was called to his attention or he noticed it by accident.

From what source could the information come that the Secretary of the Treasury had boarded a revenue cutter in New York, proceeded outside, and then ordered the flag lowered, kept it lowered, and traversed the sea incognito until he arrived at a port in New England where his summer home was located? I suppose that I shall be asked to assume that he then had a thunderous volley sounded to attract the attention of all the expectant summer residents, had the flag raised, and some sort of an aerial message sent that the Secretary of the Treasury had arrived and was awaiting the assemblage of the community to do him homage. If anyone suspects that there is any foundation in fact for these charges, I shall claim residence in Missouri, and I demand to be shown. I think it is one of the same idle, visionary conjectures that gentlemen on that side of the House are continually having. I am really surprised that there can be so little substance to what seemed to be such a serious charge when made.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman a question. Assuming it is true——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why assume anything; why not proceed to discuss facts; why assume that everything is wrong and that another Jeremiah must revisit the earth to recite the woes of mankind?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. When I am dealing with the Democratic Party I am not far wrong in my assumption that nothing is right. I want to ask the gentleman—now there is a serious side to this discussion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that; too serious to have charges of this character made unless based on the most accurate and substantial information.

Mr. HUMPHERY of Washington. I was going to ask the gentleman if it was true, assuming that the Secretary of the Treasury has used this vessel for his private purpose for pleasure, is it a violation of the statute?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The statute provides that these vessels shall be used for public purposes only, and not for private purposes. Let me give the gentleman an illustration, to show how ridiculous such charges may be. At the time of the last international yacht race I watched the races from a revenue cutter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Under what administration was that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not remember; but it was a Republican administration. The revenue cutter under the law was detailed for the purpose of policing the course of the international yacht race. It was there on public business. Under no stretch of the imagination could it be said, although I was a Representative in Congress, that I was on board on official duty or for any official purpose. I was there because I desired to see the yacht race. I was permitted to go by the gracious attitude of a Republican Secretary of the Treasury after considerable persuasion. Could it be said that the law was violated by permitting the revenue cutter to be used for private purposes to enable me and some more distinguished gentlemen to observe the race while the boat was there in the performance of the duties imposed upon the Revenue-Cutter Service by law? Can it be said that if a revenue cutter goes from the port of New York to the port of Boston for the purpose of having discharged some of the service imposed upon the department by law, that the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, who is charged with responsibility for the service, is on board make use of the cutter a use for private purposes? Assume that if on the way from one place to another it should happen to stop and let him off at some place where he might happen to desire to stay temporarily, would the fact that he got off, instead of remaining aboard and traveling past where he desired to get off, change the character of the purpose of this trip?

Mr. Chairman, it shows how easily ridiculous charges can be made to appear of great importance. I do not expect from Democratic officials a less regard for the law than from Republicans, and I know that it would be very difficult for them to have less regard for the law than some Republicans I have known.

So far as my observation goes this administration has been as careful in the observation of the law and has lived up to the obligations of the law as far as it is possible to expect mere human beings to do, and not even the most enthusiastic of us among the friends of the administration make any pretensions that this administration is guided by angelic hands. The Democratic officials are just mere men, with a keen, earnest, and patriotic desire to further to the best of their ability, unselfishly and disinterestedly, the best interests of all of the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has three minutes remaining.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized now in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York reserve the balance of his time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for one hour.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS.]

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I imagine that it would be much more conducive to a reputation for amiability to sit placidly, as we have been prone to do on this side, and listen, without protest, to bitter assaults upon Democratic public officials; but at the risk of accentuating a reputation for pugnacity, which I am sure I do not deserve or like, I shall venture to respond briefly to the observations made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. That gentleman began by expressing a disrelish for criticism of public officials, but I shall have to become vastly more credulous than ever I hope to be to attach a great deal of sincerity to that disclaimer, in view of the gentleman's violent assaults on the officials of this administration.

I have no information touching the episode which he made the subject of his remarks just now. I think the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has responded in an appropriate way to that. I do happen to know, however, that the Revenue-Cutter Service under this administration has never been put to any expense on account of any individual who may have enjoyed the privilege of riding on one of those cutters. Indeed, unless I am very much mistaken, the Secretary of the Treasury himself, when he ventures to ride upon a revenue cutter, when not in strict line of duty, defrays out of his own purse all of the expenses incident to such a trip.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have serious misgiving about the accuracy of anything that the gentleman from Iowa may say about the Secretary of the Treasury or about the Treasury Department under the existing administration, because a few days ago I sat here and heard that gentleman make one of the most remarkable assaults upon the present administration of the Treasury Department that ever I have heard made upon any department. I marveled that a Member of this House with any sort of regard for his representative responsibilities and his intellectual integrity could have so far misrepresented the facts involved in the incident that the gentleman from Iowa discussed.

The gentleman made it appear that the confusion and delay in the accounting department of the Treasury were due to the maladministration of a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury and a Democratic United States Treasurer. I assert that the gentleman from Iowa knew absolutely to the contrary.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman permit me to insert in the RECORD a report made by an accountant hired by the Secretary of the Treasury that was made to the Secretary of the Treasury last September, that proves every word that I said and much more. It is the worst indictment——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I will save the gentleman that trouble. I have the report here, and I am going to insert it in the RECORD in extension of my remarks. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The report shows that not one word of truth attaches to the assault made by the gentleman upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GOOD. On the contrary——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I will not be further interrupted.

Mr. GOOD. I will say that I did not state one-half the truth.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman from Iowa called attention to the fact that the accounting department of the United States Treasury was amazingly delayed in its operations and expressed the belief that if Members of this House could know what confusion existed there and what delay, they would "hold up their hands in holy horror."

The plain implication of the gentleman was—in fact, the gentleman's statement was—that this confusion and delay were occasioned by an incompetent United States Treasurer. The gentleman knew very well that the confusion created and the delay were consequent upon a system inaugurated by the preceding Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. MacVeagh. He also knew that the system had been administered by the Republican head of the accounting bureau and by the Republican clerks who were there when the present Secretary of the Treasury took office. [Applause on Democratic side.] I say that the gentleman knew these facts, because——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman knows that Executive Order No. 5, about which he is speaking, went into effect just about three weeks before the outgoing Republican administration relinquished that office. Is not that true?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I am perfectly familiar with all of the details of Executive Order No. 5.

Mr. GOOD. And it was put in operation at about that time?

Mr. GLASS. Executive Order No. 5, constituting one of the most extraordinary performances ever known under any administration, revolutionizing the entire accounting system of the United States Treasury Department, was issued on the 1st of February, 1913, a little more than one month before the expiration of the term of office of the preceding administration. It was put in operation under the supervision of two successive Republican Treasurers, as I recall. It was charged at the time that the order was issued for the express purpose of embarrassing the incoming administration.

I declined to ascribe any such purpose to the distinguished Republican Secretary of the Treasury, and I declined to enter upon a committee investigation because my own personal inquiry convinced me that the order was not issued with any such purpose. There was a question of propriety involved, a very serious question of propriety: That a Secretary of the Treasury on the very eve of his outgoing should be willing to embarrass his successor by issuing an order that involved a revolutionary procedure in the accounting department of the Treasury; but beyond the question of propriety there was no question of right involved. The law had been on the statute books since 1908; and, as I said the other day, the Republican Secretary of the Treasury gave as his only excuse for not issuing the order nearly four years theretofore his ignorance of the fact that the statute was in existence, albeit the law was enacted upon the initiative of former Senator Aldrich, with the avowed purpose of improving the accounting system of the United States Treasury.

The gentleman from Iowa, as he now confesses, was familiar with this order; therefore he knew that the confusion and delay in the Accounting Bureau of the Treasury were directly due to the extraordinary order issued by a Republican Secretary of the Treasury. It was due to the system inaugurated by the Republican Party on the eve of its outgoing, and at no time——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I will yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman knew that at no time from the day the Democratic administration took charge of the Treasury was the confusion as great or the delay as complete as it was under the preceding Republican Treasurers, who had operated under this order; and yet the gentleman sought to make this House believe that the confusion and delay were occasioned by the incompetency of the present Secretary of the Treasury and the present Treasurer of the United States. He concealed the fact from the House that the head of the accounting department, Mr. Baker, is a Republican, put there by a Republican Secretary of the Treasury and retained there to-day. He failed to state to the House that nearly every accounting clerk in the bureau is a Republican, put there by Republican Secretaries of the Treasury and retained under this Democratic administration. He kept back the fact that the whole confusion and delay were created by this Republican system.

Not only that; the gentleman from Iowa deliberately made it appear that the machines which were put in the accounting department were put there by order of a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, and then had to be thrown out at great loss to the Government. The gentleman knew perfectly well—he learned in his committee across the table from the Treasurer and the Secretary of the Treasury—that those machines were put in there by order of Mr. MacVeagh, the preceding Republican Secretary of the Treasury. He knew also that they were put out on order of a Democratic United States Treasurer, after he had vainly tried to make them operate. Why did not the gentleman tell the House these facts and not create a false impression here for partisan advantage? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I say the gentleman knew the facts, and I shall put proof of this in the RECORD. Here is the testimony of Secretary McAdoo before the Appropriations Committee, and the gentleman sat across the table from the Secretary when the latter was testifying:

> Mr. MCADOO. Let me say one word in this connection. I do not want to saddle anything on my predecessor, but I do want to say we found confusion existing there, and I think inevitable confusion, from the attempt to install a new system, and we were simply trying to meet the conditions and do the best we could.

Testimony to similar effect was made in response to interrogatories presented by the gentleman from Iowa to the United States Treasurer. Yet, with this previous knowledge of the facts, the gentleman stood here on the floor of this House and arraigned the Democratic Party for maladministration of the public service. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman also insisted that there had been a great increase in the clerical force of the Treasury Department. As a matter of fact, the report of the two expert accountants shows that there has been a decrease of the clerical force in the accounting department to the extent of 50 clerks. Mr. Brown, one of the expert accountants, upon whose recommendation these machines, put in by a Republican administration, were thrown out, authorizes me to say there is not one particle of justification for the criticism made here by the gentleman from Iowa, charging the Democratic administration with this maladministration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And Mr. Brown is a Republican. He said to me: "I am a Republican. I believe in the principles of my party. I wish for its success, but I refuse to countenance such a gross injustice as these misrepresentations imply." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD in order that I may present this report of these experts upon the confusion in the accounting department of the United States Treasury and upon the administration of that office.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman the date of that report?

Mr. GLASS. This report is dated May 27, 1914.

Mr. GOOD. By whom is it signed?

Mr. GLASS. It is the report of Mr. Brown, because Mr. Brown handed me the report and told me it was his report.

Mr. GOOD. Did I understand the gentleman to say he is going to print in the RECORD the report of Harvey S. Chase, to which I referred awhile ago?

Mr. GLASS. No; I have not Mr. Chase's report; but if the gentleman has the report of Mr. Chase, it relates to the administration of the accounting department under a system inaugurated by a Republican administration, and administration by a Republican chief and his clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to inserting the document referred to? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GLASS. This report will show, upon a recapitulation of economies set forth in detail, that the Secretary of the Treasury has saved $941,272 to the taxpayers of this country by his administration of that office. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the course of the discussion the other day the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] undertook to flout the economies of this administration by suggesting that he had failed to find out from the Treasury Department something of the extravagant expenses incurred by the Federal reserve organization committee in going around the country seeking information relating to the new banking and currency system. It was suggested that the gentleman from Wyoming could not get the information because the committee was afraid to reveal its extravagant expenditures. Mr. Chairman, I can supply the information. If the organization committee had expended every dollar put at its disposal, the sum would have been only $100,000. But the committee has not expended half of that amount. The expenses of these gentlemen were only $7,575.98, going from one end of the country to the other in an exhaustive effort to ascertain essential facts on which to base their action in inaugurating the greatest revolution in the banking system in this country that has been made since the foundation of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Seven thousand five hundred dollars covers the personal expenses and $1,856 the expenses of the stenographic force.

There is now to the credit of the fund $65,000. Talk about extravagance! I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], as I would ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] were he here, to contrast that expenditure of a little more than $9,000 with the expenditure of your monetary commission on its junket over the face of the earth of $287,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Two hundred and eighty-seven thousand dollars for the assembling of a library to which few persons will ever resort; for the translation of works that might have been bought for a farthing in a London book store, and for many other things that were useless. And with what result? What did we get for our $287,000? Merely a bill that proposed to turn the entire banking business of America over to "the system" which we were endeavoring to destroy. Yet gentlemen on the other side have the audacity to charge the Democratic administration of the Treasury Department with extravagant expenditures. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

There has been no extravagance under Secretary McAdoo's régime. There have been inaugurated great economies. The report of the experts which I shall presently file will demonstrate this in detail.

Furthermore, it may be asserted, the present Secretary of the Treasury has saved the country $1,387,933.70 in interest charges alone, and $267,844.51 of this amount is interest derived on Government loans to banks throughout the country engaged in helping American farmers move their crops. Theretofore the banks borrowed crop-moving funds from Wall Street, and Wall Street borrowed from the Federal Treasury without interest. Last year depositary banks paid the Treasury nearly one million and a half dollars in interest, and the Federal Treasury helped to "move the crops" at a profit of $267,000 on the people's money in its vaults.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to insert in the RECORD the following summary of places abolished in the Treasury Department, as taken from the report handed me by Mr. Brown:

EXHIBIT A.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 27, 1914.

MEMORANDUM OF ECONOMIES EFFECTED IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT SINCE MARCH 4, 1913.

A recapitulation of the economies set forth in detail in the attached memorandum shows a net saving of $941,272.

In addition to the above savings, by an order of the department of April 30, 1913, depositary banks were required to pay, on and after June 1, 1913, interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum on all Government deposits. Including interest already paid and interest due to date, the amount of income derived under this order on deposits other than for crop-moving purposes amounts to approximately $1,120,089.19; interest on special deposits for crop-moving purposes also amounts to $267,844.51, making a total net income of approximately $1,387,933.70 realized as a direct result of the order above referred to.

Improvement work is continually going on in the department, and it is necessary, if it is to be continued, that the Secretary have, as heretofore, a contingent fund at his disposal for this purpose, in order that prompt and effective results may be obtained.

Of the 300 sites inspected, about 30 have been accepted, on which $85,000 has been saved by the Assistant Secretary's negotiations with the vendors after negotiation and final recommendation by site agents.

Total saving to date on sites, $95,000.

MEMORANDUM FOR ASSISTANT SECRETARY HAMLIN REGARDING THE WORK OF THE EFFICIENCY DIVISION OF THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION IN THE TREASURER'S OFFICE.

Since the Division of Efficiency began its investigation of the Accounting Division of the Treasurer's Office the force employed on those parts of the work in which methods recommended by the Efficiency Division have been adopted has been reduced by 50 clerks, or 35 per cent, as shown by the following comparison of the number of persons employed on June 15 with the number employed about February 1, according to Mr. Baker's statement appended hereto:

[1] Estimated.
[2] Three of these clerks were detailed to the office of the Auditor for the Interior Department June 18.

Twenty clerks were relieved from duty before April 30, while the Efficiency Division was conducting experiments; the remainder have been relieved since the new system was installed on May 1.

In addition to the reduction in cost there has been much improvement in the accuracy and promptness with which checks are cleared and posted. When the Efficiency Division began its work the checks were cleared, as an average, about five days after they were received. Checks from subtreasuries are now cleared on the day of receipt, and checks from banks either on the day of receipt or on the next day. If, as is hoped, the inspection of bank stamps can be eliminated, it will be possible to clear each day all checks received up to 11 o'clock, which means a large majority of all the receipts.

Errors in the total of charges and credits, which were formerly not infrequent, have been eliminated. Checks are still charged to the wrong account, but changes now being made will practically eliminate such errors.

The foregoing results, so far as they may be credited to the Division of Efficiency, have been accomplished with an expenditure of $4,712 from the appropriation for the Division of Efficiency and $3,595.75 from the Secretary of the Treasury's contingent fund, a total of $8,307.75.

In the near future it is hoped to discontinue the examination or bank stamps, which requires the services of six clerks; to reduce by three or four clerks the force engaged in sorting checks and handling stoppages; and to reduce by about one-third the force engaged in stating disbursing officers' accounts, keeping depositary accounts, handling Treasury warrants, and registering daily abstracts of the Treasurer's account with banks.

From the foregoing statements it is clear that the 30 additional clerks requested for the Accounting Division in the Treasurer's estimates for 1915 are not needed, and it is suggested that the tentative withdrawal of the estimate for these clerks be confirmed. In preparing the estimates for 1916 it will be possible to eliminate a considerable number of positions now provided for.

Appended are (1) a statement of the more important changes that have contributed to the reduction of force; (2) a statement of further important changes proposed; (3) an outline of the present procedure; (4) a list of the clerks relieved from duty in the Accounting Division since February 1, with their salaries; and (5) Mr. Baker's statement of the personnel of the Accounting Division about February 1.

Respectfully,

HERBERT D. BROWN,
Chief, Division of Efficiency.

Approved:

JOHN A. McILHENNY,
President Civil Service Commission.

IMPORTANT IMPROVEMENTS EFFECTED IN THE WORK OF THE ACCOUNTING DIVISION.

1. CLEARING CHECKS.

(a) The examination of drawer's signature has been deferred until the checks are assembled by disbursing officers, thus facilitating the detection of irregularities and at the same time verifying the accuracy of sorting and thereby insuring that the charges against disbursing officers are correctly ascertained. (See next paragraph.)

(b) Charges against disbursing officers, which were formerly obtained by punching cards from the entries on the schedules, are now obtained by adding the checks after they have been sorted by disbursing officers. In order to reduce the number of items to be added, the totals of the tapes attached by the banks to the checks of each disbursing officer are used instead of the amounts of the individual checks.

(c) The bank schedules, instead of being proved individually with the totals of the accompanying checks, are proved in runs of about 500 checks. The checks in each run are sorted into sections by disbursing officers' numbers before being added, and a total is made for each section. Combining corresponding section totals for the various runs produces control totals, to which the charges against disbursing officers are proved.

(d) The serial numbers of checks against which stoppages have been placed are entered on the guide cards, and the checks are examined for stoppages before payment is effected. Formerly checks against which stoppages had been placed were not detected until after they had been paid.

2. KEEPING DISBURSING OFFICERS' ACCOUNTS.

The accounts are posted by means of an adding and subtracting typewriter, which automatically shows the balance resulting from every entry and at the same time accumulates totals of debits and credits for use in proving postings. Overdrafts are thus brought to attention at once, whereas formerly, when the accounts were not balanced daily, they were not certain to be revealed until the end of the month.

3. FILING AND ARRANGING CHECKS.

(a) Instead of filing checks in exact numerical arrangement from day to day, the filing section now sorts them into groups of 100 or 200, behind guides with visible tabs, and arranges them in exact numerical sequence at the end of the month. This change has saved the time of about 12 clerks.

(b) The arrangement of pension checks in numerical sequence, which served no purpose, has been discontinued, with a saving of three or four clerks.

4. STATING ACCOUNTS.

The only change thus far made in the stating of accounts is the elimination of the larger part of the pension statement. This change has relieved three or four clerks.

PROPOSED IMPROVEMENTS IN THE METHODS OF THE ACCOUNTING DIVISION.

1. IDENTIFYING CHECKS WITH SCHEDULES.

Checks are now examined on receipt to make sure that they are properly stamped by the remitting bank, so that they can be identified with the bank after having been separated from the schedules on which they are listed. It is proposed instead to puncture the checks and schedules with a special machine in such manner as to identify them with each other. This change will save the time of four or five clerks and expedite the clearance of the checks.

2. KEEPING DISBURSING OFFICERS' ACCOUNTS.

The charges against disbursing officers are now posted from adding-machine lists of the checks on which the account numbers have been entered. It is proposed to post the accounts from the checks themselves and unnumbered lists (to be identified with the checks by the amounts of the items). After the charges have been posted the account numbers will be entered on the tapes from the checks, and will then be compared with the numbers of the accounts to which postings have been made. By this means it is expected to avoid posting to the wrong account.

3. STATING DISBURSING OFFICERS' ACCOUNTS.

During July it is expected to get a number of disbursing officers to prepare and send to the Treasurer a list showing the serial numbers and amounts of checks issued by them. This can be done without additional work by means of an attachment to the typewriter used in writing checks. It is proposed to stamp the date of payment opposite the items on this list and to prove the account by listing the outstanding checks instead of listing those paid, as at present. This plan is expected to reduce the labor of stating accounts and also to make it possible to do a large part of the stating during that part of the month when the work in the other sections of the office is light.

4. KEEPING ACCOUNTS WITH DEPOSITARIES.

Plans are now being perfected for keeping accounts with depositaries which are expected to reduce the work greatly and permit it to be kept current. The important changes proposed include—

(a) Requiring banks to remit a daily schedule of certificates of deposit which will serve both as a detailed record of the charges to banks and as a detailed record of uncovered moneys, the number of the warrant, when issued, being entered opposite the description of the certificate. This will eliminate the entry of these certificates individually in two records that are now made without imposing an appreciable burden on the depositaries.

(b) Requiring the depositaries to send to the Treasury daily, with the checks and warrants paid, a notice of the transfer of funds to other depositaries; filing these notices in a check file behind guides with visible tabs; withdrawing them from this file on receipt of the corresponding certificates of deposit; comparing them with the certificates to insure that the funds were not unduly long in transit; and pinning the two together and filling them in a permanent file. Notices of transfer and certificates will be added on receipt to obtain totals for sections of the country and the notices will again be added on withdrawal from the outstanding file. Control totals will thus be obtained which will show the aggregate amount of the notices in each section of the file, and will be proved with the notices periodically. It is hoped that this plan of checking out transfers, which will eliminate the transit accounts from the bank ledgers, will save the time of six or eight bookkeepers now engaged in keeping such accounts.

(c) Transferring the liability accounts from the cash room at Washington to the Division of General Accounts and eliminating the Washington remittance account. This is an account to which are credited receipts at banks and subtreasuries which are subsequently to be taken up by the cash room and credited to liability accounts kept there. When the items are taken up on the Washington transcript, they are charged out of the remittance account. If the liability accounts are transferred to the Division of General Accounts, the receipts mentioned can be credited directly to these accounts and the Washington remittance account dispensed with.

(d) Reducing the "account proper" with depositaries to a statement of the daily totals of—

1. Revenues and repayments received.
2. Funds received by transfer.
3. Checks and warrants paid.
4. Funds transferred.
5. Balance to the credit of the Treasurer.
6. Balance to the credit of postmasters and judicial officers.

These accounts will either be posted daily from abstracts of the Treasurer's account similar to those now received from depositaries or will be required of the depositaries semimonthly, the daily abstracts being dispensed with. In either case the accounts will be balanced with sectional controlling accounts built up from the documents received each day. This plan of keeping the "account proper" will materially reduce the labor now spent on the work, and will also render unnecessary the semiannual interest statement now required of banks, as the interest charges can be taken from the account itself. The balances used in computing the interest can also be verified in totals with less labor than is now spent in proving the footings on the semiannual interest statement.

5. KEEPING GENERAL ACCOUNTS.

It is proposed to establish control over the detail accounts with depositaries and disbursing officers by means of a general ledger kept by double-entry system. This ledger will be so constructed that a trial balance from it will produce the daily cash statement.

OUTLINE OF PROCEDURE FOLLOWED IN CLEARING CHECKS.

The depositaries remitting the checks sort them by disbursing officers, and when there are two or more checks of any disbursing officer except the pension disbursing agent attach to them an adding machine tape on which the amounts of the checks are listed. The total amount of the checks of each disbursing officer is then entered on a schedule with the disbursing officer's number and the serial numbers of the checks. Pension checks are sorted by amounts, listed by serial number only on a separate pension schedule, the total of which is entered on the general schedule and put up in a separate bundle on the outside of which is entered the total amount of the checks inclosed.

On receipt in the accounting division the checks are examined to see that they are properly stamped by the remitting bank. The checks of all disbursing officers, except the pension disbursing agent, are then divided into groups—known as bank groups—comprising all the checks received from one or more banks and including as nearly as possible about 500 checks. Each group is designated by a letter. The corresponding general schedules are similarly grouped and designated by the same letters.

The bundles of pension checks are then separated from the other checks and the pension items on the general schedules are compared with the totals of the pension checks as shown on the outside of the bundles.

The totals of the schedules are then added to get a grand total for each group, and the pension-check items on the schedules are also added.

The checks are then sorted into 31 sections, according to the numbers of the accounts to which they are chargeable. (These numbers are printed on the checks.) Of the 31 sections, 10 comprise one account each, while each of the other 21 comprises a number of accounts. Stop cards are placed between the several sections.

The checks are then added, a total being printed at each stop card. The totals of the sections having a number of accounts each and the totals of the sections having one account each—known as specials—are then separately recapitulated, and the list is turned in to an examiner, who has already received a list of the schedule totals for the group and of the pension items for the group. The examiner adds the totals of the two classes of sections to the totals of the pension items and compares the result with the total of the schedules.

If the figures agree, the group is passed as correct. If the figures do not agree, the totals of the tapes attached to the checks by the banks are added for each section separately and total of each section is compared with the corresponding total obtained by adding the checks individually.

The tape is divided into three parts: (1) The list of the checks in the sections having a number of accounts each; (2) the recapitulation of these sections; and (3) the list of the checks for the "special" accounts with the recapitulation for such accounts. The first part is filed, the second part is marked to show the section number of each item and is held at the examiner's desk, and the third part is handed, with the corresponding checks, to a clerk, who marks the account number on each portion of the list, cuts it up, and assembles the portions pertaining to each account.

This clerk then adds the totals for each account from the various group lists to get a grand total for that account, and proves the grand totals for all the 10 accounts against the sum of the group recapitulations for the "special" accounts.

The checks for each of the "special" accounts are then assembled, sorted by serial numbers to the thousands digit, and searched to detect checks against which stoppages have been placed.

The remaining checks are sent back to the sorting room, where those in each section are handed to a clerk, who sorts them into a file box containing a guide card for each account in the section. The checks are left extending beyond the guides at the right-hand end to show that the sorting has not been verified. To verify sorting, the sorter compares the signatures on the checks with an autograph signature of the disbursing officer which has been pasted on the guide card.

The checks are then returned to the adding-machine room, where the bank tapes and the checks without tapes are added to get the total for each disbursing officer, and these totals are recapitulated to a grand total for the section.

In the meantime the bank-group recapitulations of the sections having a number of accounts each have been combined so as to get a total for section 1, a total for section 2, etc. These totals are compared with the totals of the checks in the corresponding sections.

If the totals agree, the tape is approved by the examiner; if they do not agree, the checks are readded individually. When the list for any section has been approved, the totals for the accounts in that section are marked with the account numbers and the tapes are sent to the bookkeepers to be posted to the disbursing officers' accounts.

The checks are then examined in order to detect any the payment of which has been ordered to be stopped. They are next stripped of the banks' tapes (see par. —) and sent to the canceling machine to be stamped with the date of payment. They then go to the file clerks.

Pension checks are proved to the accompanying pension schedules by counting those of each amount and multiplying by the amount, and by listing on the adding machine those of miscellaneous amounts. The totals for the several banks are then added and proved to the total for each bank group derived from the pension items on the general schedules. The bank number and the total amount of the pension checks from each bank are then entered on a statement which goes with the checks to the auditor each day after the checks have been canceled. When checks are received without pension statements they are stated by number and amount in the Accounting Division before being sent to the auditor.

The posting to the disbursing officer's accounts is done by means of typewriter adding machines that will add to the old balance the credits, subtract the debits, and show the new balance, and will at the same time accumulate totals of the debits and credits. Each box is posted as a unit, and the total of the debits is compared when the posting is completed with the total reached by the adding-machine operator. The correctness of the postings is thus assured. Twice or three times a month the balances of the accounts are proved by adding to the balances at the end of the preceding proof period all the credits since that time, subtracting all the debits since that time, and checking the result with the final balance.

In the file room the checks are sorted behind guides showing the account numbers, and under each account number groups of 200 serial numbers. At the end of the month the checks of each disbursing officer are sorted into exact numerical sequence and sent to the stating section, where statements of account are prepared, which show in detail checks cleared during the month and the amounts placed to the disbursing officer's credit.

Clerks returned to the offices from which they had been detailed.

MR. BAKER'S STATEMENT OF PERSONNEL AND PROCEDURE OF THE ACCOUNTING DIVISION ABOUT FEBRUARY 1, 1914.

The Accounting Division is composed of the following sections: Warrants, bookkeeping, examining, proving, sorting, and stating.

The warrant section receives and registers all Treasury accountable and settlement warrants and clears the registers when the warrants are returned paid. There are seven clerks employed in this section, including the clerk in charge and a messenger.

The bookkeeping section keeps the accounts with the subtreasuries, mints, and assay offices, depositary banks, and disbursing offices; keeps the registers of receipt warrants and journal of covered and uncovered moneys; and prepares the daily cash statement. There are 43 employees in this section, including the clerk in charge and one messenger; 31 of these are engaged in keeping books, 3 in preparing the daily cash statement, and 7 on miscellaneous work, such as correspondence, typewriting, filing, etc.

The examining section receives and examines the schedules and paid warrants and checks sent in by subtreasuries and depositary banks; keeps the registers of symbol numbers assigned to disbursing officers; handles powers of attorneys and authorities to indorse; and has charge of the key punching, tabulating, and sorting machines. This section has 47 clerks; 14 of these are engaged in handling correspondence, incoming and outgoing mail, and filing schedules; 21 in examining schedules, warrants, and checks received, and 12 in operating key and gang punching, tabulating, and sorting machines.

The proving section has 24 clerks, 5 of whom are engaged in sorting and canceling checks, and 16 on adding machines verifying the schedules.

There are 26 clerks in the sorting section, including the clerk in charge and a messenger; 3 of these are employed in handling correspondence in connection with requests for stoppages of payment, and 21 are engaged in sorting checks and arranging them in numerical sequence.

The stating section prepares monthly statements of accounts for disbursing officers and others. There are 37 clerks in this section, 12 of whom are engaged in handling correspondence and mailing statements to disbursing officers and auditors and adjusting differences. There are 4 typewriters and 21 adding-machine operators engaged in making up the statements.

The general procedure is as follows:

The schedules are received from the subtreasuries and banks by the examining section; the mail is opened, and the schedules listed for use in the preparation of the daily cash statement. The schedules and checks are then distributed among the examiners, who make an inspection of the schedules to see that they are properly prepared, and examine the checks to see that they are grouped by disbursing officers who drew them, are signed, and are indorsed by the bank that cashed them. A special examination is made of indorsements on pension checks.

The schedules are then passed to the proving section, where the checks are run through adding machines for the purpose of verifying the charges to the several disbursing officers whose names appear on the schedules.

After this work has been completed the checks are sent to the sorters for assembling by disbursing officers and the schedules are passed on to the key punchers. After the checks have been assembled by disbursing officers they are sent to the sorting section to be arranged in numerical sequence by issuing offices. The key punchers punch a card for each disbursing officer whose name appears on the schedules and a card for the total amount of the payments reported on each schedule. The cards are then gang punched and passed through the tabulating machines for the purpose of verifying the cards with the schedules, after which the cards are sorted by disbursing officers and the total amount of each officer's cards obtained.

These totals are then entered on journal vouchers which are sent to the bookkeepers for posting in the individual disbursing officer's accounts. The cards which represent the amounts paid by the several banks are sent to the bookkeeper who keeps the accounts with the depositaries.

At the end of each month the personal bookkeeper makes up memorandum statements, which are sent to the stating section, where statements of accounts are prepared in triplicate, one copy of which is sent to the disbursing officer, one copy to the auditor, and one copy retained.

All subtreasuries render daily transcripts, while depositary banks render transcripts four times each month. On receipt of these transcripts they are examined, after which they are passed to the bookkeepers, who keep the accounts with the subtreasuries and depositary banks.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GILLETT. Let the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] have five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. We are entitled to time on this side, and I will yield it then.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time, but I want to ask the gentleman not to trespass too much upon it. I have agreed to yield to a gentleman on this side some time in my own time, and I want to make some remarks on my own account.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in my own right.

Gentlemen of the committee, I think if Members will read the hearings as to what took place before the Committee on Appropriations and also the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as to the action of the House in the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, they will find that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who has just addressed the committee, is greatly in error. I stated openly and frankly when the legislative bill was before the House that under Executive Order No. 3 operations were commenced by a Republican Secretary of the Treasury; that after machines were installed, after certain work previously performed by the subtreasuries had been brought to Washington, it was found in a few weeks that the Treasury was running behind. I do not know whether the employees in the office of the Treasurer of the United States under the present Secretary are Republicans or not, and I do not care. I do know that the officials in charge of that great department are responsible for the work of that department; and to show that I have told the House what is absolutely true so far as any statements coming to me are concerned, I ask, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the report from which I have previously quoted and to which the gentleman has taken exception.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to include in his remarks the report to which he has referred. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLASS. Assuming the gentleman made as full a statement of facts in his previous address to the House as he makes now—which I insist is an assumption that does not accord with my recollection of his remarks or my reading them the next day in the RECORD—did not the gentleman make it appear that a Democratic administration was responsible for this confusion and delay, and did he not explicitly assert that it was a Democratic administration that put these counting machines in and had them thrown out on the recommendation of these experts?

Mr. GOOD. I say now——

Mr. GLASS. Now, the gentleman can answer that.

Mr. GOOD. Now, the gentleman will not take me off of the floor when I am addressing the House in my own time.

Mr. GLASS. No; I will not.

Mr. GOOD. I have been kind enough to yield to him.

Mr. GLASS. I can not take the gentleman off the floor.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman now, and I will repeat it as many times as the gentleman wants me to do so, that the present administration is responsible for the great delay and for the confusion that has existed in that department for more than a year.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman has not answered my question yet.

Mr. GOOD. I do not yield to the gentleman. I will say to the gentleman that as to whether or not the machines were thrown out or brought in by a Republican administration I do not know. I do not attach any importance to that incident. I do know that they are not now being used, and yet the last estimate for this department carried additional sums for the purchase of more of these machines.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield now. I will yield after I have answered the gentleman. I do not know, of course, what is in Mr. Herbert Brown's report, to which the gentleman has referred, and which he inserts in the RECORD, but I know this, that four or five days after I made some remarks on this subject, about two weeks ago, a gentleman employed in the Treasury Department told me that the next day after I had made my remarks the Treasurer of the United States went to the different offices under him and seemed to feel very much incensed because of some criticism that had been made of his department, and asked the heads of the departments to prepare statements, inasmuch as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] was going to make the administration's reply. I trust what the gentleman has said is the administration's reply and that this matter may now be cleared up.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Not now. I will yield to the gentleman later.

Now, in regard to Herbert Brown, I do not know what opinion he entertains of me. I do know what I think of him. I do know that I hold Herbert Brown in the highest esteem and regard, as I do also Herbert Wood. They have shown their ability and true worth. Now, let us see just what took place in the office of the Treasurer. When the Committee on Appropriations was considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill we found that Mr. Burke, the Treasurer of the United States, had had detailed to his office, in addition to his regular force, 56 men, and that they were running behind day after day. They could not secure a balance of a single account in that great accounting department of the Government.

Mr. GLASS. If the gentleman will permit an interruption there, does not the gentleman know——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. GOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. GLASS. I do not want to ask a question. I want to make a statement.

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield for that.

Mr. GLASS. I will put it in the shape of an interrogatory. Does not the gentleman know that the extra force was detailed by the preceding Secretary under an act of this House, incorporated in an appropriation bill, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to detail a force at the subtreasuries to come here and work out this new system?

Mr. GOOD. No. I know that that is not the case. A few extra clerks may have been so detached.

Now, if the gentleman will possess his soul in patience for a moment, I will make some explanation of this matter that I think will throw some light upon it.

When the Committee on Appropriations were considering an increase in the force in the Treasurer's department I called the attention of the committee to the fact that they were getting behind with the work in the Treasurer's office every day. We had extended hearings on this matter, and some publicity was given the subject. The result was that Mr. Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood from the Civil Service Commission were detailed to go to the Treasurer's office and show the Treasurer how to run the business of that office.

Mr. GLASS rose.

Mr. GOOD. I will not yield to the gentleman now; not until I make my statement. The gentleman ought not to ask me to yield in the midst of a sentence.

Mr. GLASS. I yielded to the gentleman, and I tried to do it with good grace.

Mr. GOOD. Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood went to the Treasurer's office, and they are there to-day. That office has been practically in the hands of receivers for six months, and the receivers are making a good showing. They have been there for almost six months, running the Treasurer's office. They have discharged since they went there those 56 detailed clerks. They sent 10 men to a reading room—the gentleman from Virginia did not tell it—but the facts are that they sent 10 men to a reading room, where the Government furnishes these high-class and high-paid clerks with magazines and newspapers, and they have said to those men, "You must stay out of the Treasurer's office. We have no need of your services. At any rate, you must keep out of our division."

Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood have been criticized by some of the officials under the Treasurer, and especially by the chief clerk of that department, because they have sent men to the reading room. They have said to Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood that it would create a public scandal if it were known that there were 10 men, high-paid clerks, in the Treasurer's office who are not needed and who have been sent to a reading room to read magazines when it required these men and about 40 additional detailed clerks to run the office as run by Treasurer Burke. Mr. Herbert Brown and Mr. Herbert Wood told them that it would not make any difference how much of a scandal it would create, they proposed to demonstrate how cheaply and how efficiently that office could be run, and under their management—an intelligent management, if you please—they are bringing the accounts down to date. The work will soon be current.

The gentleman from Virginia said I misrepresented the record. Here is the record. Here is an examination, which the Secretary of the Treasury paid several thousand dollars to have made, of the office of the Treasurer of the United States, and what does it show? I read from it:

DISBURSING CLERK, PENSION OFFICE.

This is the largest account both in checks issued and in money totals on the Treasurer's books. This account has never been balanced since the account was taken over February 1 last, except for the last few days in July, when Mr. Taylor assumed the office of disbursing clerk. After struggling with the February account for some months, it was sent to the auditor unbalanced a few weeks ago. So far as we can learn, no such thing was ever heard of before.

Disbursing Clerk Zappone, Department of Agriculture: Last statement rendered was for the month of March.

Disbursing Clerk Johannes, Department of Commerce: Last statement rendered the month of April was received August 21.

Disbursing Clerk Jacobs, Treasury Department: Last statement rendered the month of April was sent August 20.

Disbursing officer for Washington Navy Yard accounts: Last statement received was for the month of March.

Disbursing Clerk Wilson, District of Columbia: Statement for the month of May was received September 4.

Now, we take up the account of the redemption fund of national banks and we find from this report, as I stated some days ago, that the nearest they ever even came to striking a balance after they had been in office for seven months was a discrepancy of over $5,500,000.

That is in this statement. I do not know anything about it, except as stated by this report and Government officials. But when I have spoken upon this subject I have given the source of my information, and I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that when he reads from the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, as he has, he should remember that when Mr. Burke came before the committee and questions were asked him, Mr. Baker usually made the answer. He apparently realized that he knew but little about the business of that great office.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman said that when the United States Treasurer, Mr. Burke, was before his committee and questions were asked him, the answer was given by Mr. Baker, the Republican head of the bureau?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; but wait a moment.

Mr. GLASS. I notice from the record here that when questions were asked, Mr. Burke responded for himself. He said:

This is not our system. We did not put it in. We found it there. It is a condition. It was practically recommended by Congress when they gave the Secretary of the Treasury the power to transfer from the subtreasuries a sufficient number of clerks to do this work.

There is the answer.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman state what page he is reading from?

Mr. GLASS. I am reading from page 950.

Mr. GOOD. The fact is, the hearings will show that we commenced with that office at about page 50 or 75, or something like that, and the examination continued for a couple of months.

The hearings continued for a couple of months, and the gentleman has read from what was testified to by Mr. Burke after he had been drilled several times with regard to this subject, after Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood had established an efficiency system in the Treasury Department, and it really began to dawn upon him something of the magnitude of the work that one in charge of that great department must perform. Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood had demonstrated what a competent head of this department could do.

Mr. GLASS. But it was testified to——

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman wants to ask a question, I will yield to him.

Mr. GLASS. Was it not testified to some time before the gentleman made his speech here on the floor?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly. I do not say now that Mr. Burke did not answer a single question. Mr. Burke answered a great many questions; but when we delved into the intricate problems of his office he seemed dazed and knew nothing about them, nothing more than the Secretary of the Treasury did when he came down and testified before the committee.

Mr. GLASS. But did not the United States Treasurer put the gentleman from Iowa in possession of the fact that the system under which this confusion and delay were created was a system inaugurated by his Republican predecessor, and did the gentleman state that fact to this House?

Mr. GOOD. No; the gentleman did not put me in possession of that information. I knew it before I knew the present Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. GLASS. Did you state it to the House?

Mr. GOOD. I knew about Executive Order No. 5, and when it was issued, and I stated it to the House. You will find that I criticized the order at the hearings. My criticism of the Treasurer is that he was incompetent to cope with the situation. He did not know how to bring his work current. It was left for Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood to show the Treasurer how to conduct that office. Neither the Treasurer nor the Secretary of the Treasury can claim any credit for the savings effected by the system established by Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood. Without the aid of these gentlemen the Treasurer would still be plodding along in his old way.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of the fact that this department has been for 16 years in charge of the Republicans, how did it happen that an efficiency system was needed at this late hour?

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman had been listening to the discussion of this subject, I do not believe he would have asked that question. Executive Order No. 5, promulgated by Mr. MacVeagh early in February, 1913, which provided for bringing into the United States Treasury certain work previously done by the subtreasuries. It did unquestionably throw additional work upon the department, but the order provided for the transfer of sufficient clerks to do the extra work.

Mr. BARKLEY. What did that have to do with the question of efficiency?

Mr. GOOD. The efficiency of the department was not questioned under Republican rule. The department was efficient under MacVeagh. As stated here in the report, the accounting that your Secretary of the Treasury ordered paid for says nothing like this was ever heard of under Republican rule or any previous rule. It all goes to show that the present Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer himself were not competent to cope with the great questions confronting them in the administration of those offices.

Mr. BARKLEY. Did not the gentleman state a few moments ago that Brown and Wood were brought there for the purpose of establishing an efficiency system?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; after a Democratic administration had been in power for almost a year.

Mr. BARKLEY. How long?

Mr. GOOD. For pretty near a year.

Mr. BARKLEY. This confusion had been going on as the result of this change made in February, had it not?

Mr. GOOD. No; not as the result of that, because Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood have demonstrated that that could be cleared up in a very short time with a little intelligence and a little system in the office. It should not have taken much understanding of bookkeeping to have rejected the unworkable system installed by Baker, but it was too much for Treasurer Burke. It remained for Herbert Brown and Herbert Wood to make the change. The trouble was that your officials did not know how to run the office, and when Burke first appeared before the committee he still claimed that Baker's plan was all right; and I ask the Members to read this report, which I will put in the RECORD. It will demonstrate that what I have said to you on this subject is abundantly borne out by the facts that were in the possession of Mr. McAdoo. I have tried not to misrepresent a single fact in this case, and I defy gentlemen on the floor of this House or elsewhere to point to a single instance where I have misrepresented a fact in regard to the administration of this office. If Members will read this report that will appear in the RECORD, they will find justification of every statement I have made. Investigate that department, and you will find that the whole question arose because your officials were not capable of taking hold of these great problems and settling them in the right way. You admit it all when you admit that the civil service had to send men to show you how to run that office.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. In just a moment. The Secretary of the Treasury the other day made a statement that went out through the country, when he was answering the criticism because $80,000,000 of American gold had been sent abroad. By the way, the bill that we are considering carries an item, I forget how much it is; but I am told that the shipment of this gold has cost the Government about $35,000. The Secretary of the Treasury said, "Oh, the $80,000,000 of gold that we sent abroad does not amount to anything. We have an unlimited supply of gold." If he made this statement, and I have not seen the report denied by the Treasurer, he does not know what the facts in the case are, or else he is trying to mislead the American people. The facts are that we have a very limited supply of free gold, and anyone who will read the Treasury statement can not fail to be convinced of that fact. Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a question.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman is criticizing the Treasurer of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury. I will ask him if he recalls an instance in which a Secretary of the Treasury from his State of Iowa was involved in a transaction with the National City Bank of New York, in which——

Mr. GOOD. I do not yield for such a question.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Let me finish the question.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield.

Mr. ANSBERRY. But you did yield for half of it.

Mr. GOOD. I yielded for a question on the subject under consideration. I will not yield to discuss something foreign to this question.

Mr. ANSBERRY. This is pertinent to that question.

Mr. GOOD. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Do you know what I am talking about?

Mr. GOOD. No; and I do not care to know.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I thought so.

Mr. GOOD. The report to which I have referred is as follows:

A REPORT TO THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, WASHINGTON, D. C., CONCERNING THE CONDITION OF ACCOUNTING AND BOOKKEEPING IN THE OFFICE OF THE TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE BEGINNING OF BUSINESS ON SEPTEMBER 2, 1913, SUBMITTED SEPTEMBER 15, 1913.

To the honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

DEAR SIR: Under your instructions the undersigned, with his assistants, has been engaged, from time to time since March 31, 1913, in making examinations, investigations, and reports in relation to various divisions and sections of the Treasury Department. These reports, sometimes verbal, but usually formal and typewritten, have related mainly to the Office of the Treasurer of the United States and its various subdivisions. These formal typewritten reports were dated as follows: May 15, June 2, June 11, and July 31. In addition, the reports upon the "Daily statement" and the "Monthly statement" of the Treasury were submitted in printed form, as the results of investigations into the sources of information and the methods of bookkeeping wherefrom the figures in these statements were derived. The printed forms were accepted and adopted by you on June 30, 1913, and have been published regularly from July 1 to the present date.

Without repeating what has been already laid before you in our previous reports, I wish to present herein the results of our later investigations in the Treasurer's Office, particularly in relation to the condition of the accounting and bookkeeping at present, namely, at the beginning of business September 2, 1913—September 1 having been a holiday.

The conditions which we now exhibit are serious, and we bespeak your immediate consideration of them.

THE OFFICE OF THE TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

In the multitude and magnitude of its transactions, the office of the Treasurer of the United States is probably the greatest financial office in the world.

During the year ended June 30, 1912, the total of the entries passing through its books approximated $6,000,000,000. It maintains accounts in 1,600 national banks. It furnishes the funds and keeps the accounts of nearly 3,000 Government disbursing officers. It acts as agent for 7,500 banks in the redemption of their bank-note circulation, and it handles for the Post Office Department the deposits of surplus money-order funds from 50,000 postmasters. It receives every business day from twenty-five to forty thousand checks, and it must keep the continually changing records of nearly two billions of paper currency secured by gold and silver in its vaults. In the performance of these and other highly responsible duties the services of over 640 people are required in the Washington office alone.

It is apparent that properly to record the great amount of business which passes through the Treasurer's office, with its extraordinary maze of entries, transfers, issues, redemptions, exchanges, etc., not only is unusual skill required from the bookkeepers and accountants, but the system of accounting employed should be so complete and effective in all its parts that it will thoroughly control the millions of items passing through the books each year and at every moment properly safeguard the vast sums for which the Treasurer is responsible under the law.

THE CHANGE IN METHODS ON FEBRUARY 1, 1913.

When the new method of paying Government creditors was inaugurated, February 1 last, which carried with it the transfer to Washington of the accounts of nearly all the disbursing officers of the Government, the office was soon overwhelmed by the volume of business which fell upon it, and for the handling of which it had not had sufficient time for preparation.

Extraordinary efforts were made to recover from the disorder into which the accounts were thrown by reason of this change of method, but the work of the office is still, at the end of seven months, in such a condition as seriously to retard the work of the auditing officers of the Government, to impair the efficiency of the force handling the accounts, to make evident the inability of the office to furnish properly the information desired by Government debtors and creditors, and even to jeopardize the safety of the public funds.

With the work on national-bank accounts two and one-half months behindhand, with a week or more accumulation of uncleared checks constantly on hand, with disbursing officers' accounts unbalanced and unstated for months, with controlling accounts ignored by reason of the pressure of details, and with the task of bringing order out of the confusion which now exists deemed hopeless by the clerks engaged upon the work, it is manifest that the efficiency of the staff is seriously affected, and that the condition calls for immediate and effective remedies.

A glance at some of the disbursing officers' ledgers containing a multitude of counter entries and of unbalanced pages, as well as their generally scratched appearance—a condition for which the bookkeepers are not primarily responsible—is sufficient to cause one to appreciate the disheartening effect on men who have heretofore been accustomed to take pride in their work.

In order that these conditions may be clear to you in some detail we submit brief explanations of the situation in the disbursing officers' ledgers, in the national-bank ledgers, in the "stating section," and in the system of examining and clearing checks.

ACCOUNTS IN THE DISBURSING OFFICERS' LEDGERS.

On account of the transfer to Washington on February 1, 1913, of all disbursing officers' accounts, except a few kept in Hawaii and the Philippines, the Treasurer's office is now carrying on its books accounts with over 2,500 disbursing officers, which are kept in 9 ledgers and supposed to be controlled by summarized accounts in the cash room. As a matter of fact, these controlling accounts are such in name only, no attempt having been made since February 1 to reconcile the total of the balances in the detailed ledgers with these "controlling" accounts. In fact, the detailed accounts have at no time been in such shape that a total of the balances could be taken off. This statement of ours is best illustrated by the following examples taken from one of these ledgers a few days ago:

Account 17045. Redemption agent United States Treasurer, national-bank redemption agency.

From February 1 to August 30 the total credits to this account on the ledger were $409,166,569.94 and the total debits were $386,092,636.09. No balances have been entered in this account since it was started. The difference between the two sides is a credit of $23,073,933.85, while the balance to the credit of this account on that day, according to the "cash-room" statement, was $28,617,899.12, a difference of over five and one-half millions of dollars.

Account 17042. Redemption and exchange account.

The balance to the credit of this account according to the ledger on August 30 was $1,256,288.00. The balance according to the "cash room" on the same day was $1,863,094.35, a difference of $606,806.26.

Account 17041. Treasury warrants.

From February 1 to August 30 $15,014,336.86 was charged to this account. One credit for the insignificant sum of $15 appears against this heavy debit. In other words, on its face the account shows an overdraft of $15,014,321.68, while as a matter of fact it should show a credit balance of $3,733,805.31, according to the daily cash statement of August 30.

So much confusion has existed in these accounts that overdrafts have frequently appeared, necessitating a reexamination of all of the original items making up the debits and credits and revealing the fact that the bookkeepers had been furnished with erroneous data for posting. Counter entries innumerable have been the result, some of them for very large amounts.

Due to the uncertainty of the correctness of the balances as shown by the books, the office has been unable to state authoritatively, in response to inquiries, the balance to officers' credit, but of late has been replying to such inquiries by saying that the "amount to the officer's credit would warrant payment of his check for $———," with no certainty that this balance might not be wiped out the next day through the clearance of checks which had already been in the Treasury for a week or longer.

Since July 1 an approximate control has been established over the nine ledgers, but this control has covered only the debits and credits for the month and has not extended to balances brought forward.

These accounts, which are in all respects similar to the accounts of depositors in a bank, should be handled with the same efficiency and promptness and be as effectively controlled and proved as those of any financial institution. Until this is done there can be no assurance of their correctness at any time.

THE NATIONAL BANK ACCOUNTS.

Prior to June 1, 1913, the Treasurer had accounts in about 500 active depositary banks, but since that date the number has greatly increased, until there are now about 1,000 active accounts on the Treasurer's books, to say nothing of half as many more "inactive" accounts.

All of these "active" banks are receiving money for the Government's account, paying checks issued by officers of the Government, and transferring moneys in excess of their authorized holdings either to Treasury offices or to other national banks. Because of the magnitude and multitude of the transactions of these agents of the Government, and because the fidelity of the custodianship should be speedily determined, there is necessity for prompt verification of every charge against its account.

This, we regret to say, it does not do, and under present conditions it can not do. At the date of this writing (Sept. 2) the bank accounts have been fully verified only to June 14, while the account for the period ending June 21 is now being handled. This is to say, that over two months' banking business remains unbalanced and unverified.

Aside from the lack of accurate knowledge regarding the condition and correctness of these accounts opportunities exist for gross irregularities, the perpetration of which would seriously reflect upon the administration of the office. It would be possible, under the conditions in which the accounts now are, for an officer or employee of an active depository bank to report to the Treasurer that said bank had transferred to some other bank $50,000 or more as "excess deposits"; to charge this amount to the Treasurer's general account; to put the money in his pocket; and to depart for parts unknown without this action being discovered by the Treasurer's office within two months—long enough for the absconder to reach the uttermost parts of the earth.

Another illustration may serve to emphasize our statement. If an active depository bank should notify its correspondent in New York to deposit with the assistant treasurer in New York $50,000 for its credit as a transfer of excess deposits and at the same time advise the Treasury of such notification, and the correspondent should fail to make such deposit, it would not be discovered by the Accounting Division for over two months. In the meantime, if the correspondent bank should fail, the Treasurer might have serious difficulty in holding the original bank for the money. The latter would undoubtedly plead that the Treasurer had been guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore could not recover.

We give these illustrations to emphasize more forcibly the embarrassing situation in which the office would find itself should such an instance actually occur. We have devised a plan for keeping these accounts which will wholly eliminate these dangers, for the reason that the lack of verification of a reported transfer would be immediately discovered.

THE PRESENT METHOD OF EXAMINING AND CLEARING CHECKS.

There is received by the Treasurer's office each day from 25,000 to 40,000 warrants and checks of various kinds which have been paid by depository banks and Treasury offices, and for which the paying institution must be given credit, and charges made to the respective accounts against which the warrants and checks are drawn.

At the time the present order of business went into effect, February 1, 1913, the mechanical device, known as the Hollerith machine, was installed as a means for facilitating the clearance of the checks. It was to be expected, of course, that during the first few weeks there would be considerable congestion in the handling of these checks due to the unfamiliarity of the operators and employees with the work. The fact is, however, that even after the system has been in operation for several months the congestion has continued to such an extent as to retard seriously the work of stating and auditing the accounts. No definite figures of the amount of uncleared checks on hand had been available, but it was known to be a very large sum. On June 10 I was instructed by Assistant Secretary Williams to investigate immediately this congestion and the causes of it. This resulted in our report of June 11, which recommended that the force in the sections handling the checks should be considerably augmented by detailing clerks from other divisions of the department. On July 18 an inventory was taken of the amount of uncleared checks on hand. Since that date the total checks received and cleared each day have been tabulated, and we are therefore able to present the following statement of the total amount of checks on hand at the close of business each day from July 12 to August 30. This statement is as follows:

Statement of uncleared checks, Treasurer's office, July 12 to Aug. 30, 1913, inclusive.

30	18,834,556.94	25,241,771.59	44,076,328.53

From this statement it will be observed that the highest amount of checks on hand appears on July 15—$74,130,424.34—and the lowest on August 12—$32,347,467.87. It will also be noted that during this period of 43 working days, on 4 only was the amount of uncleared checks below forty millions, and on 24 days it was in excess of fifty millions.

Considerable criticism has been made regarding the use of the Hollerith system for furnishing to the bookkeepers the necessary data for making the charges and credits to the proper accounts, the principal complaint being that frequent errors are made in punching the cards, resulting in innumerable counter entries, and that postings can not be made from the holes in the cards as rapidly as from ordinary figures. It is true that a great number of counter entries have been put through the books on account of errors in punching and other mistakes, and it is also admitted by those in sympathy with the system that more time is required to post from the punched cards than from ordinary figures. It is also true that the skill of the operators and bookkeepers in posting to the ledgers from a group of holes rather than from actual figures ought in course of time to increase and thereby reduce the grounds for such complaints to a minimum.

These criticisms, however, do not constitute the more serious objection to the use of this device for clearing the checks. The work of the sections which handle these checks is similar to the work in a bank, and the checks should be handled with the same dispatch as in a large bank. No bank could continue in business were it to hold checks for a week before charging them to the customers' accounts. It is admitted by those in charge of the checks that under the present system it will not be possible to clear the checks the same day they are received, for the reason that two or three days' checks must be available constantly in order to keep the entire force busy all the time. As a matter of fact, however, we find that the office, with its increased force, has not yet been able to get even within five or six days of current clearing.

A further objection to the present method lies in the fact that in order to insure accuracy in punching the symbol number on the card, much time must be expended in listing and footing the symbol numbers on adding machines. It is safe to say that the aggregate amount of labor spent on this process alone would occupy all the time of two or three clerks. This would be wholly saved by the system we propose.

The inability of the office under the present system to handle and clear the checks currently also causes serious losses of time elsewhere in the Treasurer's Office and otherwise, e. g., the difficulty in ascertaining whether a check has been presented for payment on which a stop notice has been filed; the lack of accurate knowledge regarding a disbursing officer's balance, inquiries regarding which are made almost daily; also the large number of checks outstanding by the books at the end of a month, although these checks are actually in the office, which entails much additional—wholly unnecessary—work upon the disbursing clerks and auditors.

Other illustrations might be cited concerning the embarrassing position in which the office has been placed by reason of inability to furnish information which should be immediately available were the work actually current. We think, however, that enough has been shown to demonstrate the necessity for the adoption of a system whereby all checks received before noon each day will be cleared at the close of business the same day. We submit, further, that any system in which this is not possible is not efficient or economical, and that such methods can not meet the necessities of the public business. Therefore we think the present methods should be discarded in considerable part. We believe that the system now in use should be at once replaced by a more rapid and more economical system through which the business of the office may be properly handled.

THE WORK OF THE STATING SECTION.

After the close of the month, the items making up the debits and credits in the disbursing officers' accounts are arranged in chronological and numerical sequence and a schedule of these items, together with the balance as shown by the books, is prepared by the "stating section" in triplicate, one copy being sent to the officer, one to the auditor, and one copy retained.

This constitutes a "statement" of the officer's account, which when acknowledged and verified by him insures the correctness of his account on the books. It is therefore essential that this statement should be rendered promptly to the officer. Any delay in preparing and transmitting these statements not only prevents the officer from effecting a reconciliation of his own accounts and a verification thereof by departmental inspectors, but also retards the work of the auditor who is charged with the examination of the officer's account as no final settlement of the account can be made until this statement, accompanied by the canceled checks, is received by the auditor from the Treasurer. The work of the auditors under the most favorable conditions must be considerably behind the period covered by the audit, and anything that tends to aggravate this condition is to be deplored. We are informed that urgent and repeated complaints have been made to the Treasurer's office by the auditors concerning the delays in sending these statements, with the result that a large number of clerks in the auditors' offices have been forced to sit idle while waiting for these statements and vouchers to come in.

The condition of the work of the "stating section" is best illustrated by the following examples, the business of these officers being among the largest in Washington.

DISBURSING CLERK, PENSION OFFICE.

This is the largest account, both in checks issued and in money totals, on the Treasurer's books. This account has never been balanced since the account was taken over February 1 last, except for the last few days in July, when Mr. Taylor assumed the office of disbursing clerk. After struggling with the February account for some months it was sent to the auditor unbalanced a few weeks ago. So far as we can learn no such thing was ever heard of before.

DISBURSING CLERK ZAPPONE, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Last statement rendered was for the month of March.

DISBURSING CLERK JOHANNES, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Last statement, rendered the month of April, was received August 21.

DISBURSING CLERK JACOBS, TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Last statement, rendered the month of April, was sent August 20.

DISBURSING OFFICER FOR WASHINGTON NAVY YARD ACCOUNTS.

Last statement received was for the month of March.

DISBURSING CLERK WILSON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Statement for the month of May was received September 4.

We are informed that very few of the July accounts have at this writing been stated. A depositor in a bank, no matter how large his account, who could not secure a statement of his account earlier than from one to four months after the close of a period would change his bank immediately. While Government disbursing officers can not change their banker, they can not be prevented from indulging in adverse criticism regarding the administration of the Treasurer's office. Herein lies considerable danger. It is impossible to terminate these complaints, of which there have been, we are informed, many hundreds sent to the Treasurer's office in writing, so long as there is good ground for them. If the causes are not soon removed, there is probability that the matter will reach the ears of Congress, and an investigation may be ordered. Therefore, if the possibility of such a thing is to be averted, it is important that the work in this section be brought up to date immediately. We are informed that under the system which prevailed prior to last February the New York and Washington offices, which carried at least eight-tenths of the business, regularly furnished complete statements in the majority of cases by the middle of the month following the period reported.

Very respectfully,

HARVEY S. CHASE,
Certified Public Accountant.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SISSON. I yield 5 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, the facts involved in this controversy are very simple, and there can be no confutation of the definite assertion made by me that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] deliberately misrepresented them from beginning to end. He can not put into the RECORD any report that will justify any of the misstatements with which I have charged him.

The facts are, briefly, these: Treasury Order No. 5, issued by a Republican Secretary of the Treasury in the last days of Mr. Taft's incumbency, revolutionized the accounting system of the Treasury Department and the method of transacting current business. The system was devised by a Republican administration and has been administered since by Republican attachés of the Treasury Department, under a Republican chief of bureau.

When Treasurer Burke came in he found this system installed, and I am credibly told that not one single hour of Gov. Burke's incumbency of the office witnessed such confusion or such delay in the accounting system as he found when he took the oath of office. He made little progress, however, and after he had been there only six weeks he pronounced the system utterly inefficient for its purposes.

Mr. GOOD rose.

Mr. GLASS. No; I will not be interrupted by the gentleman; he was not even courteous to me. Gov. Burke had been there scarcely six weeks before he pronounced the system inefficient and appealed to his superior officer to have it changed; but Mr. Baker, the Republican chief of the bureau, insisted to the Comptroller of the Currency that it should remain. This Republican chief of the bureau, as an expert accountant, urged that the system was all right; and upon his advice it was continued in operation for some time. It was discarded only after Gov. Burke applied to the Civil Service Commission for two expert accountants to investigate and devise a better system. These experts, both Republicans, fully justified the criticism made by Gov. Burke before he had been in office six weeks. They recommended that the accounting system devised and the machines put in under a Republican administration be discarded and an efficient system substituted. Since that was done, which the Democratic Treasurer long theretofore asked to be done, the accounting has been kept right up to date. These are the facts; they can not be disproved.

The gentleman from Iowa stated that he did not say to the House that the machines were put in under a Democratic administration. I appeal from his statement on the floor to-day to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reporting his speech some days ago.

Mr. GOOD. I did not state anything of the kind.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman stated that, and the notes will show it.

Mr. GOOD. The notes will not show it.

Mr. GLASS. On page 12225 of the RECORD of June 26, 1914, the gentleman from Iowa is thus reported:

> Mr. GOOD. Is it not a fact that practically all the new machinery, tabulating machinery, that was brought in by the Secretary under the new administration was entirely discarded?

So the gentleman from Iowa did state to the House that this inefficient system of accounting with these tabulating machines was "brought in under the new administration" and had been discarded thereafter. The system and the machines were brought in under a Republican administration, and the whole change was inaugurated under the administration of Mr. MacVeagh and had been for several months operated under two Republican Treasurers by the Republican chief of the bureau and Republican clerks when Gov. Burke took office.

If I had any criticism to make of this administration, it would be directed against a hapless civil service that protects inefficient Republican employees, and thus affords excuse to Republican Congressmen to criticize a Democratic administration for Republican neglect or incapacity. Inefficient employees of the Treasury ought to be put out and somebody put in, whether Democrats or Republicans, who can properly perform the work. [Applause.]

I do not want, Mr. Chairman, to be misunderstood. I believe in an honestly administered civil service. In the 14 years I have been a Member of this House I have voted every time for suitable civil-service regulations and for civil-service appropriations; but the system should be operated fairly. And surely when a Republican official maladministers a public office it is totally dishonest for a Republican Congressman to criticize a Democratic administration for the deficiency. [Applause.]

[Mr. SISSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, I incorporate the letter and answer to the same below. I do so to illustrate the "system" employed by unscrupulous organizations who want to accomplish under cover of secrecy what they do not have the courage to do in the open—to discredit the present Democratic administration. The utter want of patriotic motives, the anxiety of men who have lived on the favor of legislation under former administrations, is fully rebuked by the person to whom this letter was written.

HOW THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF MAGNATES ARE GATHERING PUBLIC SENTIMENT AND HON. S. M. FOSTER'S REBUKE.

CONFIDENTIAL INQUIRY.

THE AMERICAN PROTECTIVE TARIFF LEAGUE,
New York, June 26, 1914.

Mr. S. M. FOSTER,
President German American National Bank,
Fort Wayne, Ind.

DEAR SIR: Our president, Col. Francis L. Leland, who is well known to you as a banker, believes that one of the best barometers of industrial conditions is the weekly pay-roll checks of merchants and manufacturers, and at his suggestion we have the honor to ask:

"First. What was the total amount of the pay-roll checks in your bank for the week ending June 21, 1913?

"Second. What was the total amount of the pay-roll checks for the corresponding week ending June 20, 1914?"

We will under no circumstances divulge the name of a bank giving us this information, but wish to publish a statement giving the comparative pay-roll checks in bulk for the weeks named.

We earnestly ask you cooperation in this inquiry.

Sincerely, yours,

W. F. WAKEMAN,
Treasurer and General Secretary.

PRESIDENT FOSTER'S REPLY.

FORT WAYNE, IND., June 29, 1914.

Mr. WILBUR F. WAKEMAN,
Treasurer and General Secretary the American Protective Tariff League, 339 Broadway, New York City.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your "confidential inquiry" of the 26th instant, in which you ask for data which you propose to use for the purpose of instituting a comparison between the pay rolls of this year with those of the same time a year ago, I beg to say:

It would be more creditable to your organization if it would use its funds along lines that would tend to decrease any tendency toward business depression that may exist rather than along lines that have a strong influence toward increasing this tendency.

The purpose of your inquiry is so clearly political, and the intent to discredit the present administration and recent legislation so apparent, that this bank declines to have anything to do with it, and feels justified in giving expression to its lack of sympathy with your efforts.

It is such movements by such organizations as yours that justify the charge that there is being made a systematic and disloyal effort to create a condition of mind in the people of the country that will bring about and intensify a spirit of commercial depression.

No more discreditable and dishonorable thing could be attempted by men claiming to be loyal citizens of the Republic. As you very well know, to spread broadcast over the country any evidence or argument tending to show the existence of business depression, only tends to produce and heighten this depression. That this is your intention and purpose is revealed in your letter, though not explicitly stated.

Very truly, yours,

SAM'L M. FOSTER, President.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CANTOR].

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Chairman, the various items contained in this bill represent the activities of the three great branches of the Government which deal with the making of the laws, their interpretation and construction by the United States courts, and with the exercise of executive power by the President.

When we stop to think of the great financial and commercial interests affected directly through these great appropriations, it is well to consider our responsibility with respect to the governmental machinery which controls these vast interests. The Democratic Party coming into power after an absence of 18 years found itself charged with the responsibility of carrying into effect by legislation the fundamental policies of the party and to apply the remedies which it has always urged for the correction of abuses in the financial system of the country, and for the relief of the people from trusts and monopolies which fostered and grew up under the care and protection of the Republicans. It was expected that in carrying out these policies and in formulating these remedies that necessarily it would cause a halt in the business of the country until finance, trade, and commerce knew the character of the new tariff law and the new currency system which had been suggested. It seemed to be a difficult undertaking to drive out special privilege and the money control protected by our political opponents for many years when in control of national affairs; and in the course of legislation made necessary for these purposes it was expected that business would wait until definite lines of legislation had been reached and finally adopted. It has always been so with business when the tariff was under revision.

In the course of the recent debates in this House, men on the other side have with ghoulish glee called our attention to every newspaper notice or clipping which showed a diminution in business and read letters received from inspired sources, which seemed to justify their statements upon the floor that national bankruptcy was practically threatened and that idleness was an epidemic. These statements have been answered over and over again by Democrats representing the various manufacturing districts, but they do not seem to have allayed the great thirst of some of these gentlemen for these misrepresentations on the subject. There is no doubt that business has halted and manufacturers, in spots, have reduced their operating expenses, but that is not true generally throughout the country, as has been amply demonstrated by the President through sources of information that could not be gainsaid. It is true that this depression has been largely psychological in the sense that the great monopolies, through the newspapers, have endeavored to create a general belief throughout the country that the Democratic Party was the enemy of the manufacturers and business men, and that it was wholly incompetent to deal with national affairs. All this was inspired by those who were deriving vast benefits from Republican rule and also had shaped legislation here in Washington and who were in practically unlimited control of the committees of this House and who had charge of that party during the various congressional and presidential campaigns of the past. I believe that the present administration has amply answered the serious charge that it was incompetent to deal with national matters. It has been a party of construction, notwithstanding the gigantic opposition from powerful sources all over the country. It has revolutionized the money system, which had entrenched itself almost beyond hope of redemption upon the trade and commerce of the country, by the passage of the banking and currency bill which, although fought bitterly during the various stages of legislation by these powerful influences to which I have just referred, have at last admitted its justice. As was well stated by Secretary McAdoo, in his interview with S. S. Fontaine, of the New York World, when he was asked the question:

When the Federal Reserve Association is in working order, do you believe that it will prevent panics?

His answer was:

Assuming wise administration, and that, I think, is certain, the new system ought to prove a successful preventive of financial panics. And why should not we assume "wise administration" of the system? The able American mind is not yet obsolete and patriotism is not yet dead. There is abundant material to draw from, not only for members of the Federal Reserve Board, but also for directors of the Federal reserve banks. We are usually the slowest people on earth to correct our own abuses, but when we once begin the job we generally do it thoroughly.

We have been trying without avail for almost half a century to reform our banking laws, and then, all of a sudden, we woke up and put upon the statute books the most far-reaching and beneficial piece of legislation since the national bank act.

I look forward to a wonderful period of financial stability, with its inevitable complement of undisturbed confidence, and to an era of unequaled prosperity for this country under the new Federal reserve system.

The provisions of the law which permit our banks to establish foreign branches, together with our new tariff law, will contribute beyond the expectations of even intelligently optimistic men to the expansion of American trade and commerce. A big foreign trade will of itself tend greatly to stabilize our domestic trade and make extremes of business depression at home far less possible. Our foreign trade has always been restrained by unwise tariff laws and a lack of American banking facilities. The new laws have removed these obstacles.

WHAT CREATED BUSINESS DEPRESSION.

Do you believe there is any truth in the rumor that there has been a deliberate conspiracy on the part of a certain group of financiers, politically opposed to the administration, to create business depression?

Answer: No; I would not say that. It would be fairer to say that there has been a systematic attempt, politically organized, to make the country believe that there is a serious business depression. All the "divine right" and "vested right" interests and most of the big financiers are allied with the political opposition to the Democratic Party and are helping the calamity campaign all they can. By "divine right" interests I mean those who because of their wealth, education, social standing, and acquired or inherited leadership of great enterprises believe that they have superior rights and are entitled to be left undisturbed. They resent any sort of change or governmental regulation or control. You may remember that a certain anthracite coal magnate some years ago assumed that attitude when the great coal strike was on. By "vested right" interests I mean those who have been long intrenched in "privilege" through favoring tariff laws and every sort of governmental bounty, and who consider any interference with their "privileges" an invasion of sacred rights. Then we have the soreheads and chronic kickers and Pharisees, who are always against an administration they can not control.

These elements, not so much by concert of action as by common sympathy, have united in a drive against the administration. They have produced the "psychology" of the situation, which, operating upon a time of the year when business, for perfectly normal reasons, is usually below par, has produced a certain amount of hysteria in shallow minds and a certain amount of fear in timid souls. But on the whole little has been accomplished. Every day their gloomy prophecies are being dispelled by facts and the steady advance of business prosperity. Crops—prodigious crops—are beginning to move and business stimulation is already reported from nearly every section of the country. We are going to have a splendidly prosperous fall season.

The tariff bill, hardly a year old, to which the manufacturing interests of the country are adjusting themselves, with the income-tax provisions, has not only proven to be a great revenue raiser, but in the end will destroy the privileges heretofore enjoyed from the high protective tariff and will reduce the cost of the necessaries of life, besides affording the opportunity of extending and increasing our manufactures, which means additional employment to the American mechanic. The reduction in the tariff has not affected the manufacturers of the United States, but, as I have already stated, has simply called a halt until they can adjust themselves to the new rates.

It has been stated by Republican Members of this House that the Secretary of Commerce, in the many addresses he has made in various sections of the country, has been more optimistic than conditions warranted, and, in fact, made statements as to the condition of business which were not borne out by the facts. They have read letters which we on our side have said came from Republican sources, intended largely, if not wholly, for the benefit of the Republican Party for purely political reasons.

There seems to have been a studied and well-devised plan for the preparation and publication of these things, in order to affect political conditions regardless of their effect upon general business and created the impression that the conditions were as they represented them. They have been properly termed "calamity howlers," without a shred of patriotism, willing to sacrifice business and financial interests for party advantage and for interests which have always pecuniarily benefited when that party was in power. As an illustration of this sort of campaigning I call attention to a letter received by Secretary Redfield from Edward Lefevre, of Fallsburg, N. Y.:

FALLSBURG, N. Y., June 25, 1914.

SECRETARY OF COMMERCE.

DEAR SIR: I see by papers you are saying business of the country is good, and I wish to state the manufacturing of paper, which is a large business in this country, is rotten.

There is very much more paper coming in this State than ever before, and has forced prices down where there is not a living in the business.

Several mills have failed in the tissue business of late, and it is impossible to get orders; can find no one with any confidence in the business ability of the administration.

Most truly, EDW. Y. LEFEVRE.

To which the Secretary replied:

JULY 10, 1914.

Mr. EDWARD Y. LEFEVRE,
Fallsburg, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 25th ultimo is received, inclosing clipping from the Paper Mill of June 20, and I note your statement "the manufacturing of paper, which is a large business in this country, is rotten."

I find, however, that your clipping from the Paper Mill of the 20th does not include all that issue of that paper had to say on conditions in the paper trade, for the same copy from which your clipping is taken also says, under the heading "Markets of the week":

"Reports from the paper-mill centers state that production is being maintained and in some cases increased on a better demand from the jobbers and large consumers."

And it also adds:

"Fine paper houses report a good demand for light weights. Wrappings are moving steadily and in larger volumes. Paper bags are in good request, with prices holding very steady."

Yours, very truly,

———— ————, Secretary.

Upon the same subject that this correspondence treats of are the following extracts from trade journals dealing wholly with the business of manufacturing pulp wood and paper:

[From the Paper Mill, Saturday, June 20, 1914.]

KANSAS CITY, MO., June 17, 1914.

Business has shown some improvement in Kansas City recently, business interests showing more disposition to turn loose their money with Kansas agriculturists engaged in harvesting one of the biggest wheat crops in the history of that State. The printing trade has taken heart and is doing nicely, while the encouragement has extended to the paper business. Collections are improved, and all lines of paper are in better demand. Prospects for fall are excellent, and Kansas City apparently is in line for big business for the next year.

MARKETS OF THE WEEK.

* * * * * * *

Reports from the paper-mill centers state that production is being maintained and in some cases increased on a better demand from jobbers and large consumers.

* * * * * * *

Conditions in the jobbing trade continue as previously noted in these reports. The demand from consumers and final distributors is said to be slowly increasing, with a greater inclination to make purchases for future requirements. Fine-paper houses report a good demand for light-weights. Wrappings are moving steadily and in larger volume. Paper bags are in good request, with prices holding very steady.

LOUISVILLE BUSINESS.

LOUISVILLE, KY., June 16, 1914.

Business with the Louisville paper men is continuing good, in spite of the fact that a lot of people are talking of hard times and business depression. Kentuckians are beginning to feel as if this sort of talk is all bugaboo. Conditions in Kentucky and the vicinity are really very good just now.

BIG PULP-WOOD SEASON LOOKED FOR BY APPLETON PULP WOOD CO.—THE FIRST RAFTS BY WATER HAVE ARRIVED.

An unusually big and successful season is anticipated by the Appleton Pulp Wood Co. in the matter of water transportation of pulp wood. The first of a dozen or more big rafts to be towed across Lake Superior this season arrived from Port Arthur, Canada, at Ashland last Thursday afternoon, and another raft of approximately 6,000 cords is expected the latter part of this week or early next. The raft that reached there last week contained a little more than 5,000 cords of 8-foot wood. The wood is being shipped by the Russel Timber Co., of Port Arthur, to the Appleton Pulp Wood Co.

MISSISQUOI MILLS RUNNING STEADILY.

SHELDON SPRINGS, VT., June 15.

The new board mill of the Missisquoi Pulp & Paper Co. at Sheldon Springs, Vt., which has been building for the past two years, has started up in good order and has now been running steadily for about three weeks. This is said to be one of the best equipped board mills in the country.

BUSINESS "PSYCHOLOGY" IN THE NORTHWEST.

APPLETON, WIS., June 22.

As has been stated heretofore in this correspondence, the paper business in this district reflects with the general feeling of lassitude that is affecting other industries throughout the country. The approach of the vacation season does not, of course, give promise of improvement.

Your correspondent's memory goes back far enough, however, to recall a good many summers in the past when the paper business was duller than it is likely to get this summer, times when some manufacturers were disposed to feel that the bottom of the world had fallen out and that the industry would never be brought back to where it was before. But in these cases prosperity always returned after its little junketing visit elsewhere. A good many manufacturers, aware of these things, are disposed to look with a good deal of philosophy upon present conditions. Resting spells like the present, they assert, wherein little mill building goes on, gives the country's constantly increasing demand for goods time to catch up with the productive capacity—even usually to exceed it—so that some morning the country awakens to the fact that it can not get goods as soon or in the quantity that it wants them. Then there is a "boom," which continues until new construction has brought production up to or beyond the amount that demand calls for.

Of course, in the present instance manufacturers hereabouts are looking for some stimulation after the middle of the summer and in the fall, due to the effect of the expected record breaking crops. Just what this will amount to or how long it will last remains to be seen. The expectation, however, seems to be justified.

SAVAGE MANUFACTURING CO. (INC.).

The Savage Manufacturing Co. has just filed a certificate of organization with the Somerset County register of deeds, for the purpose of making pulp and paper. The company is doing a unique business, continuing the industry started by E. L. Savage, of making paper for box linings, etc., from black stockings and newspapers. The stockings are used to give the various textures. It is said that this is the only firm manufacturing paper from these materials exclusively in the United States.

About 26 hands are employed, and the demand is so great that Mr. Savage plans to increase the capacity of the plant. The company is capitalized at $200,000, of which $150,000 is common and $50,000 preferred stock.

Officers of the new company are James O. Savage, of Lawrence, Mass., president; E. L. Savage, of Skowhegan, treasurer. James O. Savage, Lawrence; Charles E. Savage, Groveton, N. H.; E. L. Savage; E. Bramhall; and Minna B. Savage, of Skowhegan, are directors.

MILL STARTS UP AGAIN.

YARMOUTH, ME., June 24, 1914.

The mill of the Forest Paper Co., which was shut down for two weeks to give an opportunity to reduce the stock on hand, has started up again, and is now expected to run on full time for the rest of the year. During the two weeks' shutdown 200 men were idle.

HOLYOKE—GOOD BUSINESS SURELY LOOKED FOR.

HOLYOKE, MASS., June 23, 1914.

The trade conditions have a slightly better tendency, though they are fully expected to remain quiescent for some weeks yet. Those who have returned from short business trips say that while business is "flat," they see "no reason for scare heads about it." Shrewd observers see activity ahead. There is an unmistakable feeling that the worst has now been reached and that the turning point has come. The shutdowns are all of a temporary nature, and all for good reasons.

CHICAGO—RENEWED SIGNS OF LIFE.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 22, 1914.

A decidedly easier feeling made itself apparent in the local paper market during the last week. Paper men now freely predict that the summer in all probability will be better than most members of the trade had been led to expect Business, it appears, has grown tired of holding its breath, or, better still, has found it foolish to do so, and during the last week began to breathe freely again. Collections are reported good, and the activity of the last week was more or less of a surprise to all. Men who a few weeks ago said they were prepared to sit back and wait for fall before looking for any improvement now have jumped up suddenly and declare that July is going to witness a decided improvement in trade. There was no cause for complaint in any branch of the trade last week. Bonds and ledgers met quite a satisfactory demand. Book stock moved well at the prices which have been maintained for some time. There was a fair demand for news print. From dealers in old paper stock came particularly bright reports as to an indicated increased activity. The accumulations were comparatively heavy and there was a ready demand for old stock. Prices are just about as those quoted the week before, but it is confidently expected that improvement in this regard will come before long. Some of the local paper men look for prices to improve from 10 to 20 per cent.

FOX RIVER VALLEY—HOPE FOR EARLY REVIVAL.

APPLETON, WIS., June 23, 1914.

"I am inclined to think, and I base my judgment on actual conditions and developments of the last week, that immediately after the July 4 shutdown things are going to look up a bit." It isn't often this correspondent uses a direct quotation in regard to market conditions, but the above, coming from a man away up in the business, farsighted and conservative, is so unusual nowadays that it serves as a good and encouraging lead to the weekly market paragraph from the Middle West. The sentiment is no mono; in fact, most of the paper manufacturers share the opinion of the one above quoted. Just at present all are frank to admit that things are slower than they were a month ago, but everything industrially in this part of the country seems to be shaping itself for an early revival.

KALAMAZOO—CONDITIONS UNCHANGED.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., June 22, 1914.

The tone of the paper trade remains about the same as last week, from what can be learned from manufacturers. There seems to be but little change, although all of the mills manage to keep their machines busy.

[From the Trade Journal, June 18, 1914.]

RUMFORD, ME., June 16, 1914.

An expenditure of $150,000 will be made this year by the Oxford Paper Co. for the purpose of increasing the capacity of their plant. The largest of the new buildings—the main building, so called—is 85 by 216, and is constructed to contain two large machines. The beater room is 75 by 90 and the small building, 33 by 72. The company has a shipping platform 700 feet in length, which will soon be increased to 800 feet. The Maine Coated Paper Co., an auxiliary of the Oxford Paper Co., the buildings of which were completed last fall, is not as yet running to the full capacity of its plant, but orders are being received every day and the amount of work is increasing steadily each week. This company, too, has plans for further improvements, which will be carried out and completed in the near future.

PULP-WOOD MILL STARTED.

AUGUSTA, ME., June 16, 1914.

The pulp-wood mill of the S. D. Warren Co., at Kennebec, of which Howard MacFarlane is superintendent, has just been started for the season, and shipments of pulp wood have begun. The mill is now run by electricity, the power being furnished by motors installed recently by the Central Maine Power Co., and everything is working in fine shape. The mill will ship about 70 carloads of pulp wood per week, and the amount of poplar used for the season will be about 150 cords.

R. P. Andrews, of the R. P. Andrews Paper Co., who has just returned from a two weeks' trip in Michigan, Illinois, and other States, says that business conditions are quiet. He states that the greatest optimism is evident, however, in the West because of the "bumper" crops, and that the paper men are looking forward to one of the biggest autumns in years. While at Menasha, Wis., he attended the birthday party of George A. Whiting, of the Geo. A. Whiting Paper Co., which was also attended by many other paper men. Predictions at the party were made that the autumn would bring much better results in all lines of business.

HOLDING UP THEIR RECORDS.

The Black-Clawson Co., of Hamilton, Ohio, report that while business conditions are not what they should be, largely because of political reasons, they have nevertheless been able to keep well up toward the records of other and more favorable seasons. While there is room for improvement, they incline to the belief that conditions might be much worse, and the approach of fall should witness a general revival in business in all lines.

These dispose of at least one industry which it was charged has been practically destroyed by the tariff. I can cite others of a similar character, but it is hardly necessary to do so, as this shows the effort of one Republican manufacturer in his own branch of industry who deliberately endeavored to mislead the American people through the Secretary of Commerce.

As to the sugar industry, a letter received from the president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. stated:

It may be of interest to know that under the stimulus of the reduced tariff consumption in the Eastern States alone has increased practically 20 per cent. The consumption from March 1, 1914, to June 19, 1914, was 893,000 tons; in 1913, 748,000 tons, showing an increase of 145,000 tons.

Added to this information is the following circular, issued by the same company, under date of June 17, 1914:

FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.,
91 Wall Street, New York, June 17, 1914.

DEAR SIRS: Three months' operation under the new tariff show that the consumer is receiving all the benefit of the 25 per cent reduction in the duty on sugar. Since the new rates went into effect refiners' selling price has averaged 3.819 cents per pound as compared with an average price for the last 10 years of 4.85 cents per pound. The average in-bond price of 96° test raw sugars for the same period has been 4 cents per pound. The reduction in the duty, combined with the fact that the world's production this year is the largest on record, is responsible for the prevailing low prices, but that the reduced tariff is directly responsible for a large part of the decline is shown by the following comparison of prices between March 1 and June 1, 1914, with prices for other years when the in-bond price of raw sugars was on the same basis.

Years.	Period of weeks.	Average in-bond price 96° raws.	Cuban duty 96°.	Duty paid price raws.	Average net price refined.
		Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1904	5	2.091	1.348	3.439	4.36
1905	2	2.092	1.348	3.44	4.35
1906	14	2.072	1.348	3.42	4.375

1914	(1)	2.04	1.01	3.05	3.819

[1] Mar. 1 to June 1.

The average price of refined sugar in other years when raw sugars were selling in bond at 2.09 cents per pound, as compared with 2.04 cents now, was 4.40 cents per pound in contrast with 3.819 cents per pound during the past three months. It is therefore clear that a saving of 0.581 cent per pound is being effected by the reduced duty which, figured on the amount of sugar consumed in the United States last year, namely, 3,743,139 long tons, or 8,384,631,360 pounds, would be equal to $48,714,708. While the 25 per cent reduction in the tariff affords some relief from the exceptionally high rate that we have been laboring under, the real benefit to the consumer will come in 1916, after which a further saving of some $100,000,000 per year will be effected.

Very truly, yours,

F. C. LOWRY,
Manager Sales Department.

It is not my purpose to go fully into all the details which show that the tariff has not brought about the depression of business, spoken of by my friends on the other side, and which does not exist, and it has not affected even the items which are considered luxuries. For illustration, sugar is not wholly a necessity, because only a nominal percentage is used for the breakfast table, and it largely enters into other manufactures which can be readily imagined, while at the same time the price of sugar has been reduced to the consumer, thus showing not only was the manufacture of sugar increased but that the price has been lowered to the consumer.

I shall touch briefly upon the Mexican policy of the President. I have, with him, been firm in the belief that it was absolutely essential for the peace of this continent that Huerta should be driven from power in Mexico. This Nation, with the Monroe doctrine fully recognized, is under the necessity of preserving order and stability of government in all the Republics upon this continent.

It is certain that Huerta reached the presidency by the assassination of Madero, and he was, if not directly, then indirectly responsible for that assassination, even if he did not inspire it, and gave the order which ended Madero's life. And America could not tolerate, either in the interest of humanity or in the exercise of her power upon this continent, a succession to the presidency by any such infamous procedure. It is an object lesson to all other republics that power must come from and through the people and must be exercised in a peaceable and orderly manner and that these old-time methods of disposing of rulers will no longer be tolerated or acquiesced in. If the President had recognized Huerta, it would have been an invitation to others to achieve power by the same means; and his refusal to recognize Huerta marks him as a man of high ideals, a firm believer in constitutional government, and a strict believer in the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine. If we do not insist upon a stable government in Mexico and in Latin American republics generally and foreign interests suffer, how can we say to England, France, and Germany that they must keep their hands off, if the interests of their citizens or their lives and property are jeopardized on this continent? They would have a right to use all the power at their command, even to the extent of occupying territory upon this continent, to remedy any wrong to their citizens; but we must exercise if you please a supervision over these republics, determined that they shall use all peaceful and constitutional methods in the exercise of their sovereign power for the preservation of lives and property. We can then resist every effort made by any one of these foreign powers to occupy even a foot of land upon this continent.

In the accomplishment of these things Woodrow Wilson has gone steadily on, refusing to be swerved by any power or influence, determined that Huerta shall go, and using all lawful means to that end through the agency of those in Mexico who were engaged in open rebellion against Huerta. I fail to understand the argument of our Republican friends in opposition to the President's policy for the bringing about of peace within the borders of our sister Republic. It has been properly termed a "watchful and waiting" policy, but it has been such in the interest of peace and to prevent a war, the results of which, both in life and in financial waste, can not be estimated. It is unfortunate, indeed, that American lives have been lost, but it was well said by the President, "Their lives were not sacrificed in vain." This policy has prevented a greater destruction of American lives, and I am satisfied that he will succeed in driving Huerta out and bringing about peace and order in that distracted country.

As further evidence, if that is necessary, as to the high ideals which control Woodrow Wilson, let me refer to his course on the Panama Canal treaty. He was not coerced by Great Britain, but to me, as to others, he stated that he had not received any communication, either directly or indirectly, from that country with reference to the action of Congress in relieving our coastwise steamships from the payment of tolls; but his high sense of honor and his duty impelled him to call the attention of the Congress to what he believed to be a palpable violation of a treaty made with a foreign power, and in this, like all other questions affecting the Nation, he has not permitted himself to be swerved nor moved by sneers, ridicule, charges of cowardice, or the charge that he surrendered American rights to a foreign nation. He has been courageous enough to do the right thing.

He has been criticized for insisting upon Congress remaining in session until the new antitrust legislation was put through, and while at first his course seemed to have aroused the strongest and fiercest opposition on the part of the business people of the United States generally, yet I am satisfied that that feeling has subsided, for the business and financial interests of the country are beginning to recognize that if the existing antitrust laws are ineffective to personally punish those who have been directly responsible for the infamous financial operation of corporations so recently exposed and laid bare by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Department of Justice, those laws should be strengthened in the interest of honest dealing. Unhappily, these financial operations have resulted in causing great distress to thousands of our people whose savings were invested in these institutions without a single person being sent to jail for these rascalities.

The passage of the bills now pending will, in my judgment, have the effect of preventing a recurrence of these infamous financial operations; and while I had serious doubts about one of these bills while pending in this House, yet I am certain that as they will eventually reach the President they will serve the useful purpose of making corporate guilt personal and of avoiding scandals hereafter. No further legislation affecting the business or financial interests of the country will be enacted, I am sure, during the term of Woodrow Wilson.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago the President of the United States issued a statement in which he said there was an effort on the part of "big business" throughout the United States to bring about an adjournment of Congress. In view of developments from then until now I do not believe anybody would question for a moment but that he was entirely correct when he made that statement to the American people. It is evident that letters prepared in advance and telegrams made to order have been sent broadcast throughout this land asking citizens of the United States to sign them and then send them to their Members of Congress and Senators, calling upon them to bring about an adjournment of Congress. One was sent to a prominent business firm in my district, to which they replied through their manager, and I desire to read his reply and place it in the RECORD. It is as follows:

JUNE 18, 1914.

The ——— ——— Co., St. Louis, Mo.

GENTLEMEN: We have your letter asking us to write or wire the Senators and Congressmen from this locality to adjourn and not make any more laws.

We did not comply with your request, for the reason we disagree with you; but this disagreement, you understand, is in a friendly way, as we see it differently perhaps from other people.

The main reason we did not comply with your request was the party now in power has a great deal to do. They have and are trying to undo some things that has required the Republican Party 40 years to do, and if the Democratic Party has done it in this short time, what they have done will be for the good of the country at large, and we see no reason why they should be asked to adjourn.

Forty years is a long time, and the Democratic Party has made many promises to the people of the United States, and these promises they are trying to fulfill, as this is the first time they have been in a position of power to transact and put into execution their ideas of government, and we believe you and everyone else should let them alone.

If they can hold on long enough to convince the people of the United States that there is more in them, then some of the rich corporations and trusts throughout the country may be made to do better by them being in power.

We hope you will not think we are arbitrary in this matter, but believe that they are doing their duty honestly and squarely for the best interest of the masses of this country and let them alone.

Yours, truly,

——— ——— Co.,
By ———, Manager.

[Applause.]

I fully agree with the views expressed by my constituent in this letter. I do not give his name, as I have not his permission to do so, but suffice it to say he is a prominent business man and the manager of one of the largest and most successful wholesale and retail hardware businesses in my district. He was right when he said "the party in power has a great deal to do" in "trying to undo some things that it has required the Republican Party 40 years to do." It is a big undertaking to correct their grievous wrongs and many iniquities, but if let alone we will do it in the interest of all the people.

I desire also to call attention to an editorial taken from the Aberdeen Examiner, published at Aberdeen, Miss., and edited by Maj. S. A. Jonas. In the public press in my State he is frequently referred to as "the grand old man from Monroe." The editorial is as follows:

That old cry "Busines men want Congress to adjourn" is again heard in the land, and emanates chiefly from a class of "business men" who are deeply entangled in lawless morasses they fear to have Congress probe. No matter how long the British, German, or French parliaments prolong their sessions, the cry by cable or wireless never comes announcing a demand for their adjournment. The fact is that Congress is always in too great a hurry to adjourn, and scores of honest bills fail "for lack of time."

The "grand old man from Monroe" states in his usual clear and forceful manner in this short editorial in this paper, of which he has been the editor for, lo, these many years, the condition as it presents itself to the American people at the present time. Much "big business"—not all, it is true—has many shady methods, and they do not care to have the "blessed sunshine of publicity" turned on and these methods exposed to public gaze. [Applause.]

I desire now to call attention to the address of the President of the United States delivered before the Virginia Editorial Association, at the White House, on June 25, 1914.

The address is as follows:

I think it appropriate, ladies and gentlemen, in receiving you, to say just a word or two in assistance of your judgment about the existing conditions. You are largely responsible for the state of public opinion. You furnish the public with information, and in your editorials you furnish it with the interpretation of that information. We are in the presence of a business situation which is variously interpreted. Here in Washington, through the Bureau of Commerce and other instrumentalities that are at our disposal, and through a correspondence which comes in to us from all parts of the Nation, we are perhaps in a position to judge of the actual condition of business better than those can judge who are at any other single point in the country; and I want to say to you that as a matter of fact the signs of a very strong business revival are becoming more and more evident from day to day.

I want to suggest this to you: Business has been in a feverish and apprehensive condition in this country for more than 10 years. I will not stop to point out the time at which it began to be apprehensive, but during more than 10 years business has been the object of sharp criticism in the United States, a criticism growing in volume and growing in particularity; and, as a natural consequence, as the volume of criticism has increased business has grown more and more anxious. Business men have acted as some men do who fear they will have to undergo an operation and who are not sure that when they get on the table the operation will not be a capital operation. As a matter of fact, as the diagnosis has progressed it has become more and more evident that no capital operation was necessary; that at the most a minor operation was necessary to remove admitted distempers and evils. The treatment is to be constitutional rather than surgical, affecting habits of life and action which have been hurtful; for on all hands it is admitted that there are processes of business, or have been processes of business, in this country which ought to be corrected, but the correction has been postponed, and in proportion to the postponement the fever has increased—the fever of apprehension.

There is nothing more fatal to business than to be kept guessing from month to month and from year to year whether something serious is going to happen to it or not and what in particular is going to happen to it, if anything does. It is impossible to forecast the prospects of any line of business unless you know what the year is going to bring forth. Nothing is more harmful, nothing has been declared by business men to be more unfair, than to keep them guessing.

The guessing went on; the air was full of interrogation points for 10 years and more. Then came an administration which for the first time had a definite program of constructive correction—not of destructive correction, but of a constructive correction of admitted evil—a very clear program, disclosed, so far as possible in a general program, in its particulars as well as in its general features. And the administration proceeded to carry out this program.

First, there was the tariff; and business shivered. "We do not like to go in; the water looks cold." But when the tariff had been passed it was found that the readjustment was possible without any serious disturbance whatever. So that men said, with a sense of relief, "Well, we are glad to get that behind us; and it was not bad, after all."

Then came the currency reform. You remember with what resistance, with what criticism, with what systematic holding back, a large body of bankers in this country met the proposals of that reform; and you know how, immediately after its passage, they recognized its benefit and its beneficence, and now ever since the passage of that reform bankers throughout the United States have been congratulating themselves that it was possible to carry out this great reform upon sensible and solid lines.

Then we advanced to the trust program, and again the same dread, the same hesitation, the same urgency that the thing should be postponed. It will not be postponed, and it will not be postponed because we are the friends of business. We know what we are doing. We purpose to do it under the advice—for we have been fortunate enough to obtain the advice—of men who understand the business of the country; and we know that the effect is going to be exactly what the effect of the currency reform was—a sense of relief and of security.

Because when the program is finished it is finished; the interrogation points are rubbed off the slate; business is given its constitution of freedom and is bidden to go forward under that constitution. And just so soon as it gets that leave and freedom there will be a boom of business in this country such as we have never witnessed in the United States.

I as a friend of business and a servant of the country would not dare stop in this program and bring on another long period of agitation. Agitation longer continued would be fatal to the business of this country, and if this program is delayed there will come agitation with every letter in the word a capital letter. The choice is a sober and sensible program now completed or months upon months of additional conjecture and danger. I, for one, could not ask this country to excuse a policy which subjected business to longer continued agitation and uncertainty, and therefore I am sure that it is beginning to be evident to the whole press of this country, and by the same token to the people, that a constructive program is at last not only to be proposed but completed, and that when it is completed business can get and will get what it can get in no other way—rest, recuperation, and successful adjustment. I can not get rest if you send me to bed wondering what is going to happen to me in the morning; but if you send me to bed knowing what the course of business is to be to-morrow morning I can rest. How much better is certain justice to the men engaged in business.

It is a matter of conscience as well as a matter of large public policy to do what this Congress, I am now certain, is going to do—finish the program. And I do not think that it is going to take a very long time. I believe that the temper of those engaged in this great thing is admirable; that the various elements sometimes in antagonism in the Congress of the United States are drawing together, and that we shall witness an early statesmanlike result, for which we shall all have abundant reason to be thankful.

The President, in his usual forceful, direct, and clear style, states exactly the situation confronting the American people. He calls attention to the fact that we passed the tariff bill, and then the currency bill, and now the three trust bills are to be considered and passed before Congress adjourns. He says that action will not be postponed, because we are the friends of business.

The first of these trust bills deals with the trade commission, and gives this commission power, if this law is enacted and placed upon the statute books, to supervise and investigate the condition of the great corporations in this country. The second one adds to and gives additional powers to the Sherman anti-trust laws to control the great trusts that have so long preyed on the people of this great Republic, and the third and last one deals with the securities—the stocks and bonds—of the great railroad corporations of this country. If it should become a law no such condition could exist and no such results be reached as happened recently in the New Haven Railroad case.

The President of the United States is doing the very best he can for the masses of the American people. He is not fighting for the classes and special interests, but for the people at large, and hence this demand to adjourn. The people are not asking adjournment, but "big business" is. It will not be hard to find the pathway of duty if you honestly want to serve the people.

I desire to call attention to another editorial from the same paper to which I referred a moment ago, with reference to the President. It is under the headline of "Our Peerless President," and is as follows:

OUR PEERLESS PRESIDENT.

Woodrow Wilson is without doubt the greatest of American Presidents, and history will so style him. If he has made a single executive or administrative mistake, it has not been disclosed. If he has for a single moment surrendered conviction to win popular applause, the record fails to show it. His aims have all been lofty, and with wonderful courage he has labored for consummation, yet at all times has he exhibited the highest attributes of the statesman and diplomat, being ready for compromise and concession in the interest of the greatest possible achievement, where obstinacy, which is sometimes construed as firmness, would have either lost all or won at the expense of party harmony and organization. * * * His sincerity and patriotism; his absolute disregard for the ridicule of the cartoonist or the criticism of opponents has enabled him to secure from Congress more important legislation than was ever before enacted in a single term.

[Applause.]

That editorial expresses the opinion of the President of the United States, which I dare say, and here assert, is entertained by the masses of the American people. They are standing to-day in solid phalanx behind him, and as he presses onward in the great battle to attain greater achievements and more glorious developments in the interest of all the people they applaud him and will stand by and support him during this administration; and when the great successes and victories which he will attain during his first administration are consummated, I prophesy they will call him to the Presidency for another term. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the President is urging that the Members of Congress remain here in order that the policies of the administration and the announced program may be carried out to a final conclusion. The President of the United States called to his high office, carrying the banner of the Democratic Party, must adhere to the course he has mapped out, and the question is will the members of his party respond to his call and rally to his support in carrying out the principles of governmental policy that are correct in the light of reason and common sense. All the agencies in this country seeking special privilege are exerting all their power to embarrass and hamper his onward, straightforward, progressive march; but the country may rest in the assurance that he is a safe pilot, guiding the "Old Ship of State" in these latter days in a fearless and capable manner, and when the storm is past he will anchor her safely in port and bring solace, prosperity, and good cheer to his fellow countrymen, and the Democratic Party under his leadership will prove itself to be the unfaltering champion of a Government "Of the people, by the people, and for the people."

The hands of our great Democratic President shall be and must be upheld. He possesses the statesmanship and diplomacy of the patron saint of the Democratic Party, Thomas Jefferson, the grit and determination of Andrew Jackson, and the intrepidity and daring of the great "Harry of the West," who said he "would rather be right than be President." Any Democrat who fails to sustain him in the great battle he is waging will prove false to his constituents and the best interest of his Government and to the great country of which he is a citizen. I have sustained him in his great economic policies up to date, and I conceive it my duty, without criticism of others, to remain here until the program he has announced is fully completed and consummated. In doing so, in my judgment, I will subserve the highest interest of my constituents and the welfare and prosperity of this great Republic. With duty inscribed on our flag, let us say to the President, "We are with you, as the great leader of the Democratic Party; let your sword flash at the head of the column and lead on, and you will find no 'stragglers' or 'camp followers' in the ranks, but a united and triumphant army marching to victory under your matchless leadership." [Applause.]

The Democratic Party, standing for certain well-known principles and reforms, of which our President is a true exponent, has been intrusted with the mission of carrying these policies into execution in the true spirit of the founder of our party, who declared there should be "equal rights to all, special privileges to none." Let us remain here as long as necessary to discharge this great mission, and in doing so receive the plaudits of a loyal and patriotic people.

I would be happy to go home. I dare say my people would be glad to see me and have me tell them about some of the great things this Democratic administration has accomplished, and nothing would give me greater delight than to have that pleasure; but in view of the urgent request of the President of the United States, I expect to remain here and by my presence help to keep a quorum and by my vote help to carry out the policies and the announced program of our party and our great and good Democratic President. I have an opponent in my district who is trying to defeat me for reelection, and the primary election will be held on Tuesday, the 18th day of August; and if the program of the President is carried out, I doubt seriously whether I will have an opportunity to get back to my district by that time; but whether I do or not, I will do my duty, remembering that the immortal Robert E. Lee said "duty" is the greatest word in the English language, and leave my interest and my cause in the hands of the patriotic people whom I have on the floor of this House during all my service represented with fidelity, honesty, efficiency, and promptness. If I fall by the wayside, I will fall with my face to the front, faithfully serving my party and my country. If I triumph and am reelected, I shall be happier in the consciousness of not having deserted my post and in the realization of having at all times performed my duty to my constituents, who have honored me, to the Democratic Party, of which I am a member, and to the great country of which I am a citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I thank you, my friends, for your very kind attention. [Great applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. SISSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] that he apparently is not familiar with the history of a very peculiar transaction which was at least in part carried out under the administration of the very distinguished gentleman who presided over the destinies of the Treasury of the United States during a recent Republican administration. I would like to have the gentleman's attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair knows of no way of enforcing his attention. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. I wanted to ask him whether he knew of the transaction that smelled to high heaven and which arose out of the purchase of the old customhouse in New York City by the National City Bank. Surely the gentleman has heard something of this most remarkable transaction in which the Government sold this property at an inadequate price, so it has been said, I think, for $3,250,000; only $50,000 of which was paid down, the balance being deferred, and then the Government very kindly rented the property until the new customhouse could be completed at an annual rental of $130,600—4 per cent of the purchase price. I think that agreement was made in the early nineties, and, strange to relate, the title remained in the Government for many years, thus saving for some one the taxes that would have been paid had the deal been made in a businesslike manner.

Mr. GOOD. Well, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ANSBERRY. Just a moment. The gentleman would not permit me to finish the question I was asking of him. The gentleman said he did not know anything about that story, and did not care to hear it. Of course, we all fear the gentleman did not want to hear it.

But the story is substantially as I have stated it. The National City Bank of New York purchased the old customhouse for something like $3,250,000. It was said at the time that it was bought at considerably less than it was worth. I do not know anything about that, but I do know that they kept that transaction under cover for a long time. The National City Bank owned it, as a matter of fact. The title remained in the Government under this arrangement, and the Government, of course, does not pay taxes.

Mr. GOOD. When was this?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Never mind; I will get to that. The gentleman did not seem to be in a hurry about learning these facts in his time. I will give them myself.

Finally these facts leaked out. It was debated time and again on the floor when the rent item was being discussed in the appropriation bill as late as 1906. The newspapers got hold of it and made a scandal of it; or, rather, they told the truth about it, and the truth told about this man who was the Secretary of the Treasury amounted to a scandal.

Perhaps that would be the precise way to state it. Thereupon they completed the transaction in this manner: The title was changed, and the money that was supposed to be paid to the Secretary of the Treasury, or whoever represented the Government, was immediately deposited—and where do you think? In the National City Bank; and I assume that it stayed there until a Democratic administration came in and made them pay 2 per cent interest on the funds which they had belonging to the Government of the United States.

I say this for the information of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], who attacked a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury and said he was incompetent. He did not say he was dishonest. Certainly he did not state any facts that would come within a gunshot of the malodorous, rotten transaction to which I have referred, and which was a matter of common knowledge to every man in the United States who read the daily newspapers, and to every man in the United States who had any knowledge of what was going on in the city of Washington relative to the Government of the United States and the affairs of the Treasury at that time.

Now, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOOD. When was this? Will the gentleman give me the date?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I think the original contract was made when Lyman J. Gage was Secretary of the Treasury. Now, when was Mr. Shaw Secretary of the Treasury?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. He was Secretary of the Treasury during the last term of the administration of President Roosevelt.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I am quite certain that this contract was still being carried out when he was Secretary of the Treasury. In fairness to him, I will say I never heard his name connected with the transaction. I was mistaken when I interrogated my friend from Iowa and referred to Secretary Shaw, and of course have no desire to do the Secretary any injustice.

Mr. GOOD. Is the gentleman sure it was Secretary Shaw?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I meant Secretary Gage, whose name was bandied about in connection with that transaction.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman in answer to his question that I was certain Secretary Shaw had no connection with the transaction referred to, and I feared, however, that his information was based entirely upon groundless newspaper reports and that he had been fearfully misled.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I can not let the gentleman take all my time; but if he will get up here again and reiterate the statement that he never heard of this transaction, I will say to him that he can not only sit at my feet and get information but he can sit at the feet of every man who was a newspaper reader during the time that these things were debated in Congress and were carried in all the newspapers of the country.

Mr. GOOD. If I wanted information, I would not go to the gentleman from Ohio for it.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I fear the gentleman does not want any information. I fear that if he did get very much more information than he now has on this question—and I know he wants to be honest about it—he would get up in the House and denounce any transaction of the character I have described; and he would also apologize for the adverse references he has made to the very efficient administration of the Treasury in the hands of the distinguished gentleman who now presides over the destinies of that great institution.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made last Monday in support of my bill, H. R. 11745.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the night he signed the tariff bill the President announced to the country that he felt like "a man who is lodging happily in the inn which lies halfway along the journey."

Halfway along the journey to where?

If, looking out from the windows of his halfway inn, the President could have seen the hungry unemployed crowds that would gather along the way shivering in the snows of winter coming on, if he could have heard the famished cry for food and work down the road, he would not have lodged so happily in his halfway inn.

The little sycophantic crowd that gathered in the halfway house of presidential good cheer in October to applaud the signing of the tariff bill has grown strangely quiet since then, except for the lone vociferation of the Secretary of Commerce, lifted up like the voice of an ill-advised rooster in the night, mistaking a dark lantern for the sunrise. [Laughter.]

The blasts of triumph blown on the passage of the Federal reserve act have died away like the blast frozen in Munchausen's horn.

Whatever there was of reassuring promise in the Federal reserve act is fading away.

Banks do not make prosperity. Banks live on prosperity. Confidence makes business, and business makes prosperity.

It takes something more than the creation of Federal reserve banks and the transmutation of debts into money to make money move from hand to hand and turn the wheels of industry.

Taxes were never higher in time of peace than now, and yet excessive taxes are being supplemented by the tax of idleness, and idleness is the heaviest of taxes.

The policy that sends our money abroad to enrich foreigners at the expense of our own people; the policy that gives our market away to foreign nations that protect their own markets against us; the policy that promotes foreign industry by depressing American industry; the policy that drives American labor out of work in order to give work to foreign labor; the policy that forces American business to the wall to increase foreign business—such a policy deposits no money in American banks, but it does deposit money in foreign banks.

Give a man a chance to do business and banks will lend him money, but if you legislate him out of business his credit is gone.

The man who wants to borrow money at a bank must give security now as heretofore, but the business of the country is without security, except the security that on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November there will be a referendum on the state of business. [Applause on the Republican side.]

PROMISES.

This administration has been in power now for about 16 months. Everybody realizes that. Business depression is widening and deepening dangerously.

The newspapers from day to day have told the story of business depression, reduced credit, slow collections, men out of work, bread lines, municipal lodging houses, and of how even the morgue was used in New York as a place of refuge on winter nights for the living as well as the dead.

You went into power through a split in the Republican Party on a platform which, in the language of Bill Nye, has "gone flickering up the flume."

In it you said protection was the cause of high prices and "that no substantial relief could be secured for the people" under protection.

You told the farmers and the laboring men that they were the "chief sufferers" by reason of protection; that protection "raises the cost of the necessaries of life" to them, "but does not protect their product or their wages."

You told the people that "material reductions should be speedily made upon the necessaries of life" that you were going to do it "by legislation that would not injure or destroy legitimate industry," and you said your "pledges were made to be kept in office as well as relied upon during the campaign."

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FARMERS.

In the campaign that followed you quivered with emotion from town to town about the high cost of living and how you were going to reduce it.

Your Ways and Means Committee, in its report on the tariff bill, specified the advance in farm products as a cause of national solicitude and framed its bill with the deliberate purpose of cutting down the farmers' proceeds.

You told the farmer the duty did him no good; you told him that he was one of the chief sufferers by reason of protection, and, besides, you said you had constitutional scruples about levying duties except for revenue, anyway.

You said it was one of your fundamental principles that protection was unconstitutional, and then you proceeded to frame a tariff bill to cheapen farm products, reduce the wages of American labor, and lower the level of American citizenship.

You invited foreign ships to unload their foreign cargoes here, and forced American farmers to tax themselves to build roads and bridges for the convenience of Canadian competitors, whom you invited across the line by low duties or no duties.

Your tariff bill has opened no market anywhere for American commodities, but has opened the American market for foreign commodities everywhere.

SUGAR.

You took the duty off from sugar, deprived the country of the revenue derived from sugar, restored the Sugar Trust to power, and organized a policy that will wipe the beet and cane fields off the face of the map, to save a theoretic cent a month per capita on sugar, provided the Sugar Trust does not take it.

Obviously you regard sugar growing as illegitimate and the Sugar Trust as legitimate.

A gentleman writes me from my own district: "I have 25 shares—$100 par—of beet-sugar stock, which I will sell to any Democrat at 50 cents on the dollar. They say 'we do not want to injure any legitimate business,' so they ought to be glad to buy at that price. This stock sold at $105 per share about a year ago."

WHEAT.

You figured up the growing acreage of wheat in Canada, and then you cut down the duty on wheat to make wheat cheaper, and thereby make bread cheaper.

You made wheat cheaper and you made farmers poorer, but the one-sixtieth of a cent which you theoretically saved on a loaf of bread for every cent you assessed the American farmer on a bushel of wheat is absorbed long before the elevators, millers, bakers, retail dealers, and railroads have finished taking toll along the way from the wheat fields to the consumers of bread, and bread is no cheaper.

By a curious course of reasoning, when you reduced the duty on wheat to make bread cheaper you retained a duty of 50 cents a barrel on flour to protect the miller.

Obviously you regard farming as illegitimate and milling as legitimate.

CORN.

The duty on corn was 15 cents a bushel. You made corn free. The corn belt of the United States produces a distinctively American crop, and it produces distinctively American men, who know exactly what is being done to them.

Argentina is the corn belt of the Southern Hemisphere. Their corn matures in May; ours in October. Argentine land is cheap and the wages of Argentine labor are low.

The rate on corn from San Lorenzo, Argentina, to New York ranges from 5 to 6½ cents a bushel on full cargoes, and—

Corn is shipped from Rosario, Argentina, to New York for about the same rate as is charged by rail from Buffalo to New York. (Farmers' Bulletin 581.)

To Galveston the rates for the last few months of 1913 were considerably lower from the upriver ports of Argentina than from Kansas City. The rate from Kansas City to Galveston in 1913 was 9.8 cents per bushel, while three out of four rates from Argentina to Galveston were less than 7 cents, one of them being as low as 5.1 cents per bushel.

Ocean rates apply to full cargoes; that is, when a ship is chartered to carry corn only. Regular lines of steamships, where smaller lots than full cargoes are carried, often charge lower rates than are paid on full cargoes of corn. (Farmers' Bulletin 581.) And tramp steamers bring corn for 3 cents a bushel.

About 10,000,000 bushels of corn have come from Argentina in the last eight months, and most of it has been consigned to the Corn Products Refining Co., a Standard Oil corporation.

The freight on corn from Chicago to New York is 11.8 cents a bushel. Obviously western corn can not pay the freight and compete with Argentine corn in the East, and corn has dropped 12 cents below October prices, notwithstanding the short crop of 1913.

The corn crop just husked in Argentina is the largest ever raised there. It will furnish 250,000,000 bushels for export, and the newspapers state that the officials of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad are so "impressed with the immense business now in sight by reason of the huge crop Argentina has just raised" that the old method of billing corn through from New York to New England points on a local tariff, plus 3 cents for lighterage, has been abandoned, and a new and lower rate has been inaugurated on corn from tidewater to New England points, as a result of which the whole New England market will be lost to American corn.

Heretofore the farmers of the Middle West have supplied New England and the East with corn. Hereafter Argentina will supply New England and the East with corn, and hereafter New England will buy her corn no cheaper, but New England money will go to Argentine farmers instead of American farmers and will go to foreign ships for carrying corn from Argentina instead of to American railroads.

Not only that, but the newspapers say that the last week of April 750,000 bushels of Argentine corn were contracted for by Chicago dealers to arrive by way of Montreal, and that importations of Argentine corn have found their way to Oklahoma.

If the importation of 10,000,000 bushels of Argentine corn in the last seven months can break the price of corn and take away from our own people not only the eastern market but invade the very heart of the corn belt, what effect will the importation of 250,000,000 bushels have?

You have made the American farmer poorer and the Argentine farmer richer and corn products are no lower.

Every bushel of Argentine corn, grown by cheap labor on cheap land displaces a bushel of American corn, and the whisky distillers, the Glucose Trust, and the Starch Trust take the profit; the consumer pays no less and the farmer stands the loss.

But when you took the duty off from corn, you kept a duty of $2.90 a gallon on whisky and 40 cents a hundred on corn meal.

Obviously you regard whisky and corn meal as legitimate and corn as illegitimate.

OATS, BARLEY, RYE, HAY, POTATOES, AND DAIRY PRODUCTS.

You cut the duty on oats from 15 cents to 10 cents a bushel and, in the language of your own bulletin:

The increased importation of corn from Argentina has been accompanied by an immense importation of oats from Canada into the United States.

You say:

Relatively small consignments were received in July, August, and September, 1913, but with October a larger movement began—

So that, as you explain—

The total imports during the four months ending January, 1914, amounted to over 16,000,000 bushels, or more than the total imports during the seven years beginning July 1, 1906, and ending June 30, 1913. (Farmers' Bulletin No. 581.)

Every bushel of imported Canadian oats displaces a bushel of American oats, and the importer and the dealer take the profit and the farmer stands the loss.

You cut the duty on barley from 30 cents to 15 cents a bushel. Canada produces barley, and so does North Dakota. The price of barley in Chicago ranged from $1.20 to $1.30 a bushel in April, 1912, and from 55 to 60 cents a bushel in April, 1914, and the brewer takes the profit and the farmer stands the loss.

You reduced the duty on barley and retained a duty of 45 cents a hundred on barley malt. Why? Is farming "illegitimate" and brewing "legitimate"?

You cut the duty on hay from $4 to $2 a ton, and the dealer and the importer take the profit and the farmer stands the loss.

You took the duty off from rye, and the importer and the distiller take the profit and the farmer stands the loss.

You took the duty off potatoes, and the importer and the dealer take the profit and the farmer stands the loss.

In a speech recently made at Bingham, Me., ex-Gov. Fernald, of Maine, speaking from an intimate knowledge of conditions, declared that Maine dairy farmers are losing $7,000 a day.

Gov. Fernald owns a creamery, and in March, 1913, he was paying farmers 33 cents a pound for butter fat, but in March, 1914, under the new tariff law, the price of butter fat was forced down by Canadian competition to 23 cents a pound, and butter is no cheaper, and the farmer stands the loss.

Gov. Fernald told his audience that in one day he counted 29 carloads of Canadian hay at Danville, on their way to Boston; and ever since the new tariff law was passed the Maine farmer has been receiving $2.50 less a ton for hay than theretofore, and the importer takes the profit and the farmer and the Treasury stand the loss.

The Michigan Manufacturer and Financial Record says:

Michigan farmers are up in arms over the injury done the dairy interests by the new tariff law. The bottom has dropped out of the market for dairy products and prices have lowered about one-third in the last three months.

Cream, or butter fat, has dropped from 32 to 22 cents; milk from $1.90 to $2 per hundred to $1.35 delivered at the factories at Obly and Bad Axe * * *.

One farmer stated that his milk checks for March were $30 less for the same quantity than for February.

You tried to placate the farmer by taking the duty off from farm implements and the price of farm implements has gone up.

But suppose a farmer's implements will last five years; and suppose before the duty was removed it cost $500 to buy the implements to start the average farm; and suppose after the duty of 15 per cent was removed the farmer saved the whole amount, bought his implements for $425 and saved $75; and then suppose you calculate the loss the farmer will sustain each year on every crop he grows by reason of tariff reductions, and the result will show his loss on crops each year to be greater than his total gain for five years on implements.

BEEF.

The shouting and the tumult of the last campaign have died away and history is passing judgment day by day. You said protection was the cause of high prices, and you took the duty off from meats, deprived the Government of the revenue derived from meats and turned it over to the packers, but prices have gone up.

I offer in evidence your own official declarations, and I read from Farmers' Bulletin No. 581, as follows:

There are nine establishments for slaughtering, chilling, freezing, and exporting beef located in or near Buenos Aires, and five of these companies are owned and operated by Chicago slaughtering and packing houses. These five do by far the major portion of the entire business (p. 31).

Most of the meat that comes from Argentina comes from Chicago packers who consign it—to themselves at New York for sale by themselves in New York or wherever they please to send it by rail. It is not assumed that they are using Argentine beef to beat down the prices of Chicago beef (p. 39).

The packers then control prices, the farmer takes what he can get, and the consumer pays what he must.

You told the people in the last campaign that the quantitative theory of money was a dream; that the law of supply and demand had been repealed and higher prices inaugurated by protection; and that you were going to reduce prices by reducing duties.

But I offer in evidence the declaration of the Department of Agriculture that—the large increase of the value of meat animals on farms is accounted for by the increased cost of production and the increased consumption or demand, arising from the fact that production has not kept pace with the increase of population, and in the case of cattle and sheep has actually declined. (Bulletin 575, p. 4.)

We told you that ten thousand times in the last campaign, but you kept right on talking about protection being the cause of every evil.

You told the people who live in cities that the farmer was getting too much for what he had to sell. Now you admit that—this unprecedented increase in the average value of meat animals does not necessarily mean that farmers and stock raisers are making more, if any, profit. (Bulletin 575, p. 4.)

You did not care to discuss the law of supply and demand in the last campaign. You wanted to keep right on talking about protection.

Now you say:

The cost of production has probably increased more rapidly than the increase in the selling price of live stock. (Page 4.)

You argued in the last campaign that the fact that prices were high demonstrated that farmers were getting too much for what they had to sell.

Now you say:

It is well known that producers of farm products are the last to receive any benefit from higher prices paid by consumers, yet they are prompt to increase production if there is a prospect of realizing better returns. (Page 5.)

We had arguments, essays, speeches, and denunciations in the last campaign about the price of meat and the farmer's relation to it.

Now you say:

The very fact that there is a present shortage of nearly 19,000,000 meat animals in the United States since the census of 1910 indicates clearly that the business is not profitable to producers; otherwise every farmer and stock raiser in the country would have increased his herds of meat animals. (Bulletin 575, p. 5.)

CHEESE.

Day by day your own official records have been compelled reluctantly to demonstrate the slowing down of factories, the falling off of exports, and the swift advance of foreign importations.

The tariff wall is down, the surplus is wiped out, the Secretary of the Treasury is treasurer of an overdraft, and the high cost of living is advancing with remorseless disregard of decreasing pay rolls.

But we are not without relief. The Secretary of Agriculture has issued a little book on cheese. It tells you how to use cheese instead of meat. It says cheese "is so used by the peasants of some parts of Europe."

It tells you that "one of the best ways to reduce the expense of your food is to substitute cheese for meat."

Therefore, if you are hungry, eat cheese.

If porterhouse steak costs too much, eat cheese.

When the mills shut down, eat cheese.

When the pay check stops, eat cheese. [Laughter.]

PRICES.

You said you were going to reduce the cost of living.

You have reduced revenues, business, wages, and employment, but you have not reduced the cost of living.

Again I introduce in evidence the declarations of your own witnesses.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, in a bulletin printed February 10, 1914, reports "the prices of 15 common articles of food in 40 important industrial cities, in which live one-fifth of the total number of people in continental United States," and admits that, comparing prices on December 15, 1912, with prices on December 15, 1913, 13 articles advanced and only 3 declined in price.

The Chicago Daily Trade Bulletin shows that the wholesale price of potatoes ranged from 35 to 40 cents a bushel on May 1, 1913, and from 60 to 68 cents a bushel on May 1, 1914.

That the price of Baldwin apples ranged from $2.50 to $3.50 a barrel on May 1, 1913, and from $3.50 to $5.25 on May 1, 1914.

That the price of eggs ranged from 16 to 17 cents a dozen May 1, 1913, and from 18 to 18½ cents on May 1, 1914.

That "fowls, dressed, scalded, and iced," ranged from 16½ to 17 cents per pound May 1, 1913, and were 17 cents a pound May 1, 1914.

That creamery butter ranged from 27½ to 28 cents a pound May 1, 1913, and from 21 to 22½ cents a pound May 1, 1914.

That smoked hams ranged from 16½ to 17 cents per pound May 1, 1913, and from 15½ to 16 cents May 1, 1914.

That smoked shoulders ranged from 12¾ to 13 cents per pound May 1, 1913, and from 13¼ to 13½ May 1, 1914.

That fresh lamb ranged from 11 to 12 cents a pound May 1, 1913, and from 11 to 12 cents a pound May 1, 1914.

That fresh veal ranged from 12 to 12½ cents a pound May 1, 1913, and from 12½ to 13½ cents a pound May 1, 1914.

The Weekly Northwestern Miller shows that flour ranged from $4 to $4.20 per barrel May 3, 1913, and from $4 to $4.20 a barrel April 25, 1914.

The Northwestern Provisioner shows that fresh beef (good native steers; carcasses) ranged from 12¾ to 13 cents a pound May 3, 1913, and from 13 to 13½ cents a pound April 25, 1914.

You told the people that protection had reared a wall around the helpless victims of licensed plunder, and that you were going to tear down the wall and inaugurate a millenium of low prices, by letting in a flood of cheap-made, cheap-grown, foreign commodities.

Ask the people this fall how they like your method of lowering prices, and count their answers in the ballot boxes.

Prices were high here, high the world over—high in protected countries, high in unprotected countries—but you told the people that protection was the sole cause of high prices, and that the way to lower prices was to elect a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress. They did it; and your tariff for revenue is producing a deficiency of revenue.

Ask them how they like it this fall, and count their answers in the ballot boxes.

The President talked about how you were going to make things cheaper in the "market basket," and you assessed the farmer to make things cheaper in the market basket, on the theory that he was getting too much for what he had to sell, forgetting that you can not strike a blow at one industrial class without injuring every other industrial class.

FARMERS NOT RECEIVING THEIR SHARE.

But your Secretary of Agriculture now admits that—we have suddenly been brought face to face with the fact that under existing conditions, in many instances, the farmer does not get what he should for his product. (Annual Report, Secretary of Agriculture, p. 19.)

Is it a good way to help the farmer get what he ought to get for what he has to sell to take away from him his home market and give it to foreigners?

The Secretary of Agriculture says:

According to the best guess I can secure, it appears that less than 40 per cent of the land is reasonably well cultivated, and less than 12 per cent is yielding full returns or returns considerably above the average.

Is it a good way to help farmers to raise bigger crops to force down the price of what they raise by forcing them to compete with cheap foreign land and cheap foreign labor?

Again, I offer in evidence the declarations of your own departments. Mr. Leon Estabrook, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, in the Department of Agriculture, says:

The condition is undoubtedly a marketing problem.

And explains that—

The high prices paid by consumers, ranging from nearly 5 to 500 per cent more than the farmer receives, indicate that there is plenty of room for lowering the cost of farm products to consumers and at the same time largely increase the cash income per farm without increasing production.

But you have proceeded upon the theory that the best way to lower prices is to lower the farmer's income and increase the income of foreign farmers.

Mr. Estabrook says:

The long line of distributors and middlemen between the farmer and the consumer are in a position to take advantage of the market and, to a certain extent, control the market in both directions, because they are better organized to keep informed of crop and market conditions, and to act promptly, than either farmers or consumers who are not organized, and as individuals are helpless.

But you invite foreign importations to force down the prices of farm products and offer a wider range for dealers and importers to enrich themselves at the expense of both farmers and consumers.

The money that goes to Argentina for corn and beef; the money that goes to Canada for cattle, meat, wheat, oats, rye, barley, potatoes, and hay; the money that goes to Australia for wool, beef, and mutton; the money that goes to China for eggs, builds no homes, builds no barns, buys no tools, pays no wages, and pays no debts. It goes away to stay.

PSYCHOLOGY.

When the new tariff law went into effect at 10 minutes after 9 o'clock on the night of October 3, 1913, foreign goods of the estimated value of $170,000,000 were being held in bonded warehouses waiting to be released under the lower duties of the new law, and these importations have gone on until the first six months of the new law resulted in a loss of nearly $78,000,000 in our foreign trade compared with the same six months a year ago.

Every dollar's worth of foreign goods displaces a dollar's worth of goods made here and takes its toll out of the pay envelope of every American workingman.

Before the import of manufactured materials and the export of manufactured products began to dwindle under this administration we had 35,000,000 people engaged in gainful occupations—twelve and one-half millions engaged in farming, eight and one-half millions in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits, six millions in trade and transportation, and eight and one-half millions in professional and domestic service—and we were all interdependent then as we are now.

We had 600,000 factories with an annual output of $13,000,000,000, paying out $3,000,000,000 a year to 6,000,000 people whose purchasing power depended on their work, and their work depended on the factories and the factories depended on orders and orders depended on prosperity.

But when the mills shut down and the pay check stops, men buy less and less at the stores and the stores buy less and less of the mills and the farmer sells less and less to everybody.

On May 20 last a deputation of manufacturers and business men told the President that business was halting and depressed; that thousands of men were out of work; and that capital was unwilling to extend itself under present conditions.

In reply the President told them there was "no material condition or substantial reason why the business of the country should not be in the most prosperous condition" and that the present business depression is "merely psychological."

In his "Civil Liberty" Lieber says:

It is a psychological fact that whatever interests or excites a number of separate individuals will interest or excite them still more when brought together.

About 100,000,000 people in the United States know that things are wrong, and the instantaneous spread of thought by telegraph, telephone, and newspapers brings them together in a national consciousness that things are wrong.

But the President disposes of a condition, obvious to all, by saying that it is merely a state of mind.

He says, in effect, all things must have a cause; and, since there is "no substantial reason" for business depression, therefore there is no business depression.

It is all very simple. Hard times are an illusion. An empty stomach is an hallucination. Men out of work and shrinking pay rolls are ocular delusions and languishing trade is a figment of the imagination.

Facts are "merely psychological." "This is the atmosphere we breathe with so much refreshment" while our home market is being given away to foreigners and being exploited by foreign trusts; while the purchasing power of our own people is being reduced and our money is being sent abroad to enrich foreign nations; while the level of American citizenship is being lowered down to the level of foreign citizenship.

DEMOCRATIC EFFORTS TO REALIZE A PROPHECY.

You went about talking about a gibbet for business men who protested against being driven out of business by a bad industrial policy.

Was there ever a thing more puerile than to suppose that business men would stop their business and talk hard times for political effect?

Was there ever a time when business men more loyally tried to make the most of a difficult situation?

Was there ever a more gratuitous insult to the intelligence and patriotism of the business men of America than to suppose that they would go into bankruptcy for political effect? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Everybody knows that prices are up the world over.

Everybody knows that high prices are not due to local or temporary causes.

Everybody knows that the rapid growth of industrial centers in America has pushed on the era of high food prices.

One hundred years ago only 5 per cent of the people lived in towns. Now nearly 50 per cent are congested in cities.

Some 57 years ago Macaulay, writing to an American correspondent, predicted that—the time will come when wages will be as low and fluctuate as much with you as they do with us.

Then—

He said—

your institutions will be fairly brought to the test.

You Democrats are urging on the day of low and fluctuating wages.

And then Macaulay prophesied that—the day will come when, in the State of New York, a multitude of people, none of whom has had more than half a breakfast or expects to have more than half a dinner, will choose a legislature—

And he asks—

Is it possible to doubt what sort of a legislature will be chosen?

Speaking from the standpoint of a confirmed distrust of a democratic form of government, he added:

There will be, I fear, spoliation. The spoliation will increase the distress; the distress will produce fresh spoliation.

Abraham Lincoln once said:

If danger ever comes to us, it can not reach us from abroad; it will rise up from among ourselves.

Every patriot prays that danger may be averted, and yet you statesmen deem it wise to hasten on the day of lower wages in the face of a world-wide condition of high food prices.

In the presence of the struggle for life in great industrial centers, in the presence of the steady rise in prices the world over, you chatter like children about protection being the sole cause of high prices and propose to make the people better off by taking business away from American manufacturers and giving it to foreigners; by taking bread out of the mouths of our own people and feeding it to foreigners.

In the presence of the certainty that hunger and want and desperation would follow from your policies, you went about telling audiences that protection was the exclusive cause of high prices and how you were going to make prices lower. You have not lowered prices, but you have lowered the wages of labor and lowered the level of American citizenship.

Clearly there was never a time when it was more the duty of legislators, scientists, and philanthropists to help to increase our farm products; to encourage American agriculture; to keep business booming; and to keep labor employed at good wages; but you statesmen met the need by discriminating against the American farmer, by prating about the tariff being the sole cause of high prices, and by forcing down the level of American citizenship to the level of foreign citizenship.

The halfway house of dreams has disappeared, and the road this side has led all the way downhill.

The presidential cavalcade, with its outriders of political soothsayers and jugglers, preceded by the Secretary of Commerce blowing his empty horn of plenty, is passing men out of work, listless factories, and dissatisfied farmers on its way to a signboard marked November, 1914. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS].

A HARBINGER OF PERSPECTIVE PROSPERITY.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, some very interesting figures have recently been given to the country by our learned and esteemed Secretary of Commerce, and they certainly afford the basis for some real thought. The gentlemanly optimist of the present administration must certainly view conditions in their perspective through the glasses of some foreign optician if he perceives anything of a comforting nature in his latest statistics. Of course, the gentleman is an acknowledged authority on some things which peculiarly fit him for the position he now occupies as the administration's "harbinger of perspective prosperity." According to his own statements upon the floor of this House he has long been engaged in the "blowing" business, and no one in touch with the activities of the gentleman from New York will dispute the wisdom of the Chief Executive of this Nation in selecting him for the important position he now occupies. It has been said that the fans and blowers manufactured by his concern are the best on the market to-day, and there is no doubt in my mind, from what I have heard and read, that the manufactured products of his factories can, without loss or waste, "blow hot or blow cold," at the option of the operator.

It is but meet and proper that during these torrid days of business depression and stagnation that some one thoroughly familiar with the prevailing atmospheric conditions should be on hand ready to regulate the fans and blowers in the various industries of this country. Why not place the Weather Bureau under the supervision of the Department of Commerce?

But methinks it will take something more than fans and blowers to bring back to life the dead and dying industries throughout the land. Mr. Redfield is a gentleman and a scholar and entitled to the respect and admiration of his countrymen. Anyone who can face the business men and workingmen of this country at the present time and present facts and figures in such a manner as to make them believe that times are prosperous is entitled in after years to a prominent place in Statuary Hall. I respectfully suggest that the pedestal be boldly marked with this inscription: "This statue was made in foreign lands and chiseled by foreign artisans."

No one doubts the sincerity of Mr. Redfield, nor his loyalty to the American people; but one is apt to think, and justly so, that his view of business conditions is in reality from the standpoint of a foreign observer. During the year 1912 the Secretary made several interesting speeches in this House which were generously punctuated by applause. He drove home some cold facts. One thing he said strongly impressed me at the time, and I desire now, through the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to extend him my heartfelt thanks. Be it remembered that he stated in a discussion of the tariff measure that he was engaged in foreign manufacturing, and, to use his own words, "My concern is at this moment erecting a factory in Canada to manufacture goods in Canada." It is true that he gave several plausible reasons for engaging in business there, but the one thing that impressed me most was the fact that the Canadians were loyal to their own industries, and he called especial attention to the fact that Great Britain exhibited everywhere these signs: "Buy British goods." And, to further use his language, he says: "That scheme is worked to the fullest limit all over Great Britain and is taken advantage of, and very properly so, by English manufacturers."

But there are a few questions that might properly be asked at this time. Aside from the preservation of patent rights, what benefits could be derived in Canada by Mr. Redfield's manufacturing concern that could not be derived in this country? It can not be that the esteemed Secretary of Commerce would prefer to engage in business under some other flag than the Stars and Stripes. It can not be that a free trader would go to Canada in order to get protection for a home industry. Certainly the fact that Canada has a tariff measure capable of protecting its home industries was not taken into consideration in the establishment of the factory. The question of wages and the cost of living could not have entered into the proposition. What, then, gentlemen, was the real reason? If we can find out what it was, we might be able to improve our own conditions.

The fact remains that his concern established a business in Canada, while not only Canada but every other country on the face of the earth is deriving benefits for its own industries at the expense of our own people. If Mr. Redfield and the other advocates of the so-called Underwood tariff bill could see things as they really are, rather than in the perspective, things would be speedily changed and the wrongs righted. They will be after the next election.

I wish to call attention to some of the statements emanating from the chamber of commerce concerning our importations and exportations. The increase of all imports during the month of May amounted to $31,000,000. The total imports for the first eight months under the present tariff measure amounted to $1,288,656,041 as compared with $1,233,519,365 for the same period last year. Free merchandise for the same two periods was respectively $800,214,038 and $683,015,455. Of course, the difference in the figures is not real, but purely psychological. Our total exports for the first eight months during the same period amounted to $161,732,619, a psychological decrease of 16.9 per cent since the previous May. Our total exports were during the same period $1,640,367,305 against $1,786,070,945. But then that is merely a psychological statement sandwiched in with theoretical explanations which doubtless will appeal to business men in this country. The greatest apology he offers for the present business depression is that commercial depression is world-wide. That sounds good and may fool some people, but the great body of American people will look at conditions from their own standpoint rather than through the glasses of some one else. They know that in reality times are bad and that theoretical preaching will not fill their empty dinner pails. The American people believe that business, like charity, should begin at home, and will from this time forth fight for the protective principles of our forefathers. Let us throw the arms of protection around our varied industries and preserve them from the onslaught of an unequal competition based wholly upon a different scale of wages and a lower standard of civilization. Let us use the slogan, "Buy American-made goods," and do something to encourage the business men of this country to invest their money in home industries and to increase the size and the number of pay envelopes on pay day. The Secretary of Commerce admits that the net export balance for the current fiscal year will exceed $400,000,000, approximately $250,000,000 less than that of last year. What has become of that balance, gentlemen, and whither are we drifting? But we are accustomed to hearing explanations and apologies and can expect to hear them during the rest of the present administration. In fact, it might well be termed "An apologetic administration." Methinks the administration doth apologize too much. We have apologized and kowtowed, kowtowed and apologized, to very nearly every nation on earth, for very nearly everything under the sun, and have made ourselves the laughing stock of the civilized world, and according to latest reports there are three or four more apologies incubating. A few more apologies, gentlemen, and the American people will excuse you from further service and let you go home; but before you go, in the name of humanity, apologize to the American people for the awful ruin you have wrought. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, a number of associations are being formed all over the United States for membership, in which I commend the Members on the Republican side of the House. The motto of these associations is: "Boost, don't knock." [Laughter.]

The only trouble with this country is the continual knocking of the calamity howlers who are in the minority in the Government of the United States. My prophecy is that the next election will eliminate the most vociferous of them from public life. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER].

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, since the Democratic Party has been in power in the Philippines we have occasionally heard grumblings of discontent from certain gentlemen in this country and in the Philippines which seem to arise out of the fact that that great man and Democrat, Gov. Gen. Burton Harrison, formerly a distinguished Member of this House, is governing those far-off islands in the interest of the Filipino people instead of in the interest of the Sugar Trust, the Harvester Trust, and Republican politicians.

The ring of disgruntled ones is composed mainly of a group of controlled newspapers, trust magnates, and former office-holders in the Philippines, who are up in arms because the new administration has interfered with and reversed the old policy of exploitation of the Philippines and the Filipinos.

Gov. Gen. Harrison is sincerely endeavoring to get the Filipinos ready to take charge of their own government, and it is only to be expected that there should be a wail of anguish go heavenward from special privilege.

The fact is, however, that the Filipino people realize the new administration in the Philippines has their interest at heart, and they are glad indeed that there has been a change of administration. They bless the day it came.

In this connection I wish to insert in the RECORD a speech delivered by the Hon. MANUEL L. QUEZON, Delegate to the United States from the Philippine Islands, before the Chamber of Industry at Cleveland, Ohio, April 14. Mr. QUEZON's work in this country for the earliest possible independence of the islands is known to every Member of this Congress, in which body he is held in the highest esteem.

Mr. QUEZON's speech is as follows:

THE DUTY OF THE UNITED STATES TO THE FILIPINO PEOPLE.

"Mr. Toastmaster and gentlemen of the Chamber of Industry, in view of the fact that this is preeminently a gathering of business men, it would perhaps have been more appropriate had I selected for my topic the agricultural, commercial, or industrial conditions in the Philippines. I have, however, decided to touch upon a loftier subject—the duty of the United States toward the Filipino people.

"Americans have the reputation of being, and they are, a practical people, but not, I am convinced, 'practical' to the extent of sacrificing their sense of national rectitude to the desire to make money. On the contrary, from what I personally know of the characteristics of Americans, in addition to what is to be gathered from their history, I believe that much as they, being human, take a fancy to the pleasant twinkle of a double eagle, the feeble blaze of gold is, and I hope will always be, as nothing compared with the steady light of patriotism which has ever been the American's guide in political as well as economic affairs. You Americans refused to pay a nominal duty on tea, and yet were ready to spend every cent and sacrifice every man in this land to uphold your principle that 'taxation without representation is tyranny.' You would not give one cent for tribute, but millions for defense. You waged among yourselves the bloodiest war of modern times because of the doctrine that no nation can endure half slave and half free. You must therefore consider not only the cold question whether the Philippine Islands, looked upon as a national investment, pay or do not 'pay,' but the additional question—by far the more important of the two—what the nature of the duty of the United States toward the people of the islands really is.

"Fortunately for you in this case, duty goes hand in hand with your pecuniary interests.

"The days when nations considered themselves free to do with and to one another as they pleased are, thank God, over. No decent public opinion would to-day countenance the naked proposition that a stronger nation may, simply because of its strength, arbitrarily impose its will on a weaker. No one now dares to deny that the moral laws which bind individuals in their intercourse are equally binding upon nations. One nation dealing with another is expected to carry out its promises, if specific promises are made; or, in the absence of special compact, to maintain an attitude suggested at once by the principles which form the bulwark of its political existence, and by the law of nations.

"Gauged by the foregoing ideas the duty of the United States to the Philippines is plain: Congress should enact a law giving the Filipinos their independence. The reasons are these:

"First. That this country has promised, both expressly and by implication, to withdraw its sovereignty from the Philippine Islands—by implication, when upon the declaration of war between the United States and Spain the Government of the United States asserted that that war was not waged for territorial aggrandizement or commercial expansion; expressly, in that the past Republican and the present Democratic administrations have both declared it to be the policy of the United States to give the Filipino people their independence when they can establish and maintain a government of their own competent to discharge its obligations both domestic and foreign.

"Second. That the fundamental propositions upon which the Declaration of Independence was based and from which it acquires its obvious justification are these two great and complementary principles: (1) That all Governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed, and (2) that the right is inherent in every people to establish such government as to them shall seem best.

"How could you then impose your government upon the Filipinos and call the action just when its powers are not derived from the consent of the governed? How can you deny to the Filipinos the right to establish such government as to them shall seem best and yet remain true to your own principles?

"Under these principles and in the light of those solemn promises, could you now, if you would, turn around because of the insidious campaign of a few interested persons and forever retain the Philippines under the pretext of some religious, scientific, or other alleged beneficent motive? Would you, if you could, do a thing that would place upon your history an indelible stain? The answer of every self-respecting American can be but an energetic 'no' to those questions.

POLITICAL CAPACITY OF THE FILIPINOS.

"But, it is said, this is a settled matter; the Filipinos will most assuredly have their independence; it is only a question of time; they will be free in five or four or perhaps three generations, if at that time they wish to be free from us. Let me tell those who thus speak that the question of time is all important here. Those who promise an independence to be granted when you and I and our sons and grandsons are all dead and properly buried are either insincere and too shrewd to disclose to the American people the real purpose which underlies their protestations, or, if they are honest, they have been fooled. Indeed, for all practical purposes, in so far as the American and the Filipino peoples are now concerned, to promise that the Philippines shall be free in the course of the next hundred or seventy-five years is tantamount to an assertion that the islands are permanently annexed to the United States.

"What would that promise amount to when you, who make it, shall not redeem it, and we, to whom the promise is made, shall not live to see it realized? Can you by your pledge bind generations yet unborn?

"But, the objectors assert, the Filipinos are not ready and will not be ready for self-government for years and years to come. This talk of independence is all folly. It is but the cry of a few Filipino politicians, who, disguised as patriots, desire to get power in their hands in order that they may enslave and exploit their own people, but who will not be able to maintain any kind of government, because they will soon be cutting each other's throats in a mad scramble for office.

"To this the Filipinos unanimously say: We all want independence and are entitled to it. The argument of Filipino incapacity for self-government is hypocritical. It is the veil with which the American officeholder covers his desire to keep his place. It is the ambush behind which lurks the company which monopolizes our hemp and the sugar interest, which have already acquired, in defiance of an act of Congress, 65,000 acres of land in one tract, and are ready to get more if given time and opportunity. Or at best it is the wish father to the thought of some American missionaries or churchmen who mistakenly think that they can make more converts among the wild men of the Philippines if they are backed by American soldiers.

"Our adversaries proceed: The masses of the people in the Philippines are in such a state of dense ignorance that they know nothing and care less about independence. Those people are semicivilized, if not entirely savages. Some of them eat dogs, and for proof we refer you to the St. Louis Exposition, where Igorots were exhibited engaged in that toothsome pastime. As further proof of the deplorable condition of those people behold the 'moving' and 'nonmoving' pictures of naked natives armed with bows and arrows and spears. It would be a pity to see this people adrift. The Government of the United States alone can civilize them, and it must, for the sake of humanity, undertake and carry to its successful termination this altruistic work.

"Again the Filipinos answer: We know that we are a civilized people and have been civilized for 300 years. We know that there are only 600,000 non-Christians in the Philippines, while there are 7,000,000 Christians, 65 per cent of whom were literate before American occupation, and at least fully 75 per cent of whom now are. We know that we had a university in the Philippines even before Harvard University was established and that now we have two. We know that we had 1,674 public schools before American occupation, distributed among 900 towns, and now we have 4,404. We know that we had colleges in every important capital city and several in Manila for both men and women before American occupation, and that now the number has greatly increased. We know that there are Filipinos in the supreme court of the islands—the chief justice being one of them—who are at least equal to their American associates. We know that half of the judges of the court of first instance are Filipinos. We know that all the justices of the peace are Filipinos. We know that the municipal and provincial governments are administered by Filipinos elected by Filipino voters. We know that the Philippine Assembly, the lower house of the legislature, is composed entirely of Filipinos, also elected by Filipino voters; and we know that if permitted to elect the upper house of the legislature we would elect senators who would be equal to their task. We know that we could elect a president who would be at least as wise and patriotic as any chief executive the President of the United States could appoint over us.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN MEXICO AND THE PHILIPPINES.

"Finally our opponents end this controversy by exclaiming, Behold Mexico to-day. If you make the Philippines independent, another Mexican situation, which would perplex the United States with a repetition of the 'watchful waiting' policy, is sure to arise.

"This Mexican argument seems effective nowadays. I do not know much about Mexico and the causes that lay at the root of this unfortunate disturbance in that Republic. But there is something I can say in connection with this argument. In the first place, when we judge other people's affairs it is well to remember that paragraph of the Scriptures which tells us, in effect, that we should be fully aware of the beam in our own eye before commenting on the mote in that of our neighbor. What nation on the face of the earth has been free from internal disorders or revolution? What nation can say that it will ever be free from this, the most dreadful calamity that can befall any country?

"In the second place, let me give you some points respecting the principal differences between conditions in Mexico and conditions in the Philippines, which may explain why we confidently expect that that which is going on in the distressed Republic of Mexico will not happen in the islands if free from the control of the United States. I am making no invidious comparisons, but merely stating facts. Mexico acquired its independence from Spain by force of arms, and previous to that time the people of Mexico took no part in the government of their country. Despotic foreign absolutism was the kind of government that prevailed in Mexico until then. Once independent, a democratic form of government was established. The change was so radical that the failure of the new government was inevitable. Moreover, the great majority of the people (upon which democratic governments must depend) did not have either education or property, and therefore did not possess those qualifications leading to the maintenance of public order and of law. To this day knowledge and wealth are still the monopoly of the few. In the Philippines, on the contrary, the majority of the people are literate and property owners. Besides, we have been practicing the art of self-government for 15 years under American supervision. During this time we have been electing our provincial and municipal officials, members of our assembly, and, although the political campaigns in the Philippines are heated, we have abided by the results of the elections or have gone to the courts with our protests. We have never resorted to arms to settle any controversy. Now, gentlemen, these are precisely the conditions that give stability to a democratic government—an intelligent and property-owning electorate habituated to respect the will of the majority.

"But after all is said and done, the question as to the Filipino capacity for self-government can be satisfactorily answered only by a practical showing.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S POLICY.

"President Wilson has undoubtedly realized this fact, for he has adopted a policy whereby the question can be settled in the only practical way. After reaffirming the oft-avowed policy that independence is the goal toward which you would move as rapidly as the safety and permanent interest of the people of the Philippines would permit, the President has appointed a majority of Filipinos in the Upper House, thus giving us the control of both branches of our legislature so that we may fully show our legislative capacity. The Governor General of the Philippines at the same time, in harmony with the policy of the President, is appointing Filipinos to responsible administrative positions. If, in this test, the Filipinos are successful, the speedy end of your occupation of the islands should come. If the Filipinos fail, there will be a halt, and friends of colonialism may claim, at least, a temporary victory.

"Is there any fair person who could object to such a policy? If our opponents are sincere in their contention that they object to our freedom only because we are not fit to be free, why should they object to this practical test? If we are really incapable of assuming and exercising any governmental power, is not this the surest and quickest way of finding it out? I must admit that this policy did not altogether suit the Filipinos. We expected and hoped for a more decisive step than this. We construed declarations made by the Democratic leaders and contained in the Democratic platform as meaning the immediate enactment of a law that would grant Philippine independence as soon as the Democrats came into power. And we were the more prepared to construe the platform thus, because, in our opinion, no further test of our political capacity was necessary considering that during 15 years of Republican administration we had successfully handled each new administrative task submitted to our control. Yet in spite of our natural and justifiable anxiety to obtain our independence without delay, having absolute faith in the honesty of purpose of your great President whom we all admire and love, we have determined patiently to abide by his decision and have been willing to await and give him the time to observe the results of the test to which he has just put us. But our opponents were not prepared to adopt a similar attitude. Why? Simply because they feared the outcome. They know that in this trial the Filipinos will be successful and they are not ready to give us a fair chance.

MALICIOUS CAMPAIGN AGAINST INDEPENDENCE.

"So, since the Democratic Party's victory at the polls in November, 1912, up to this day our adversaries have been misrepresenting conditions in the Philippines in their endeavor to poison American public opinion. Upon the receipt of the news that a Democratc administration had been elected they asserted that the mere triumph of the Democratic Party, carrying with it the possibility of Philippine independence, had shaken our social, economic, and governmental structures, and had given rise to a situation of general distress. When a few months later the then President-elect made his first reference to the Philippine question in a speech delivered at Staunton, Va., at which, in passing, he said that he hoped that the Philippines would soon cease to be the frontier of the United States, absurd reports of the effect of this speech upon the Philippines were instantly circulated. Here is what a correspondent of a great metropolitan paper said:

"When the words of his Staunton interjection—'The Philippines are our frontier; I hope that we shall soon be able to deprive ourselves of that frontier'—had been published in the Philippines there fell upon the flourishing and expanding business of the islands a most killing frost. * * *

"Like a clock in a house shaken by an earthquake, that new-found business expansion stopped; like a pulse in the body struck by lightning, the current of its life ceased to throb. * * *

"The banks shut down on practically all loans and overdrafts. Capitalists, accustomed to place their money through brokers on commercial loans, drew in their funds; insurance companies and other institutions that had been investing their surpluses in local enterprises closed their doors to such transactions. * * * Professional men and salary earners who had been putting their savings into local industries began to draw out their money as fast as possible, and to divert their monthly balances toward the savings banks. * * *

"Real estate values have fallen off nearly 100 per cent, or it would be more exact to say that practically all movement in real estate has stopped, and it has become impossible to estimate values from market transactions. The business is paralyzed.

"If we use a little common sense in reading this report, its absurdity will at once be revealed to us. Only the most shameless determination to use every means to prejudice public opinion without the slightest regard for truth could explain how any sane person would write such statements. Can you imagine that the speech of any man, even though he be the President-elect of the United States, could produce instantaneous paralysis in business, immediate falling off of the value of real property to such an extent as to leave no value whatsoever—for this is what a hundred per cent decrease in value means? The author of such reports insults the intelligence of his readers.

"From the same sources that originated this stupendous story a cry went up to heaven when, but a few months later, and already as President of the United States, President Wilson announced his policy for the Philippines and appointed a majority of Filipinos to the commission. They called this step revolutionary and predicted every calamity for the islands in consequence.

GOV. HARRISON'S ACCOMPLISHMENTS.

"Then when the present Governor General sent by President Wilson tried in earnest to carry out the policy of his superior by giving the Filipinos opportunity to show their administrative capacity, these same persons stopped at nothing short of personal insult in their effort to discredit the governor. Gov. Harrison found upon his arrival in the Philippines a bureaucratic, top-heavy government, and he has substituted for it a simpler, more scientific, and less expensive one. He found that offices which could and should be filled by Filipinos were unnecessarily in the hands of Americans, notwithstanding the promise of his predecessors that such offices would be given to the natives of the islands, and he proceeded to redeem these pledges. He found an extravagant government, whose outlay exceeded its income, and he placed it on a self-supporting basis. He found the faith of the Filipino people in the representatives of the American Government in the islands shaken, both because of this extravagance and of a general failure to fulfill promises. He proceeded to restore the confidence of those people in the United States, so that to-day, as never before, you have your best friends in the people of the islands.

"How has this patriotic and statesmanlike endeavor of Gov. Harrison been received by the opponents of Philippine independence? The answer is to be found in the public prints. The governor has been accused of demoralizing the service, of "kicking out" American employees, of creating anti-American sentiment in the islands, of having produced depression in business—in a word, of bringing about a chaotic situation there.

"I shall not impose upon your kindness by wasting your time and mine in answering these biased and self-interested critics. Enough for me to say that no man in whatever position or of whatever nationality was ever given by the Filipino people such a magnificent reception as was tendered to Gov. Gen. Harrison upon his arrival at Manila, because the fame of his righteousness and ability had preceded him there. Delegations from every Province of the archipelago came to Manila to greet their governor. I know of persons who traveled on foot through the mountains and valleys of northern Luzon for several days in order to have the pleasure of hearing the inaugural address of the new governor general. The largest crowd ever gathered in Manila, numbering thousands upon thousands, were aligned upon the route from the pier, where Gov. Harrison and his wife landed, to the Luneta, where he delivered his inaugural address and conveyed to us the message he brought from the President of the United States. Flowers, banners, arches, and bands of music gave evidence of the cordiality of the reception to Gov. Harrison by the Filipinos. So touching a sight will never fade from the memory of Gov. Harrison though he should live a thousand years.

"The people of the Philippines have not been disappointed in Gov. Harrison. His popularity has been increasing, and during the short time of his administration he has demonstrated that we were right in placing our confidence and hope in him. His achievements will speak of American intelligence, justice, and patriotism long after his detractors are dead and forgotten. How hard he has worked and how economical and efficient a government he has given us! He has not only honored himself and the President who has appointed him, but he has also honored his own people and has given credit to the whole American Nation.

"The effect of the so much criticized step taken by President Wilson in giving us the control of the Philippine Legislature and of the policy of Gov. Harrison in appointing Filipinos to responsible administrative position has been to restore faith and confidence in the American Government on the part of the Filipino people, while the practical result has been efficiency and economy in the service. Before the Filipinos had full control of their legislature there had been for three consecutive years a deadlock concerning the appropriation bill between the popular house, which refused to indorse the extravagance of the commission, and the commission itself, which insisted upon such extravagance. The government expenditures were defrayed through executive orders, and they were always in excess of the ordinary revenues. Bonds had to be issued and a part of the gold-standard fund spent to meet the deficit. Since the Filipinos have had the control of both branches of the legislature there has been enacted an appropriation bill, which does away with the unnecessary expenses of the government. Thus, further deficits have been avoided.

THE NEW PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE A SUCCESS.

"The conditions existing in the islands prior to the inauguration of President Wilson's policy are set forth by Gov. Gen. Harrison in his first message to the Philippine Legislature in the following words:

"From June 30, 1908, when the surplus in the insular treasury was ₱17,499,894.97, the surplus has fallen as of June 30, 1913, to ₱14,230,220.23. Of this sum, however, about ₱5,000,000 is only nominally available, it being invested in supplies and having been carried to the surplus account in 1911, thus leaving an actual cash surplus in hand at the conclusion of the last fiscal year of only about ₱9,000,000.

"This shrinkage in the available surplus of the government has come about notwithstanding the fact that during this period of four years the sum of ₱6,000,000 has been obtained by the sale of an issue of public-works bonds and expended out of the treasury, and notwithstanding the further fact that a little less than three and a half million pesos from the gold standard fund has during this period passed through the treasury in the same way. * * *

"Our treasury is therefore obviously approaching a point where a deficit of four and a half million pesos confronts us. How, then, shall we avoid this deficit and restore the finances of our government to a normal and self-supporting condition? In my judgment, but one course is open * * * and that is economy of the most drastic kind.

"A considerable burden is also laid upon the treasury by the large proportion of American employees in this government. While the enunciated policy has been to reduce this number as rapidly as possible consistent with the demands of fairness and efficiency, the last annual report of the bureau of civil service shows that there were more Americans having a permanent status in the Philippine civil service in 1912 than in any previous year since 1905.

"We find, moreover, that as incident to highly centralized bureaucratic government a number of offices have been created and salaries have been raised without, what seems to me to have been, due authority of law; and as further inevitable result of bureaucracy, here as elsewhere, too many offices now exist.

"A further and perhaps considerable saving might be effected by a change in our method of appropriation; good usage elsewhere commends to us a system of direct treasury appropriations."

"The situation after the first session of the legislature, when in both branches thereof Filipinos alone, with the exception of the Governor General, were seated, it described in the following message of the governor to the legislature at the closing day of its session:

"Gentleman of the Legislature, nearly four months ago I addressed you for the first time. I came to you then with high expectations of your legislative ability; those expectations have now been justified. During the regular session which has just elapsed your labors for the public welfare have been earnest, industrious, and efficient. Your course has been one of progress and economy of the public moneys. Many laws of great importance have been enacted. Among these is the general appropriation act for the current expenditures of the government, the first to become law since 1910. This act effected many reforms in the fabric of this government, and has met with widespread approval. Peace and prosperity throughout the islands and tranquillity of the public mind bear evidence of this approval. The President of the United States has expressed his appreciation, and the Secretary of War has sent the following message:

"'I congratulate you upon the passage for the first time in three years of a general appropriation bill and on the fact that the bill was passed unanimously by both houses. I have no doubt but that there were, as to a great many features, differences of opinion, but it is a source of satisfaction to the department that such differences were satisfactorily adjusted. Please extend to both houses of the Philippine Legislature my congratulations on this event and express to them my hope that this is but an indication of what may be expected in the future.'

"The art of government is in many respects, the highest of the sciences. You have already demonstrated the ability of a legislature composed almost entirely of Filipinos to enact difficult and progressive legislation. In the days to come you will maintain the high standard you have already raised.

"This is the testimony of a competent and unbiased observer. Gov. Harrison, before going to the Philippines, was the ranking Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. His ability and patriotism was unanimously conceded by both Senators and Representatives, who had every reason to know him intimately, because for many years he had been working with them, and when appointed governor of the Philippines he was paid a tribute by the Senate and by the House seldom, if ever, given to other officials. His nomination was not only unanimously approved in the Senate, but was confirmed within 24 hours after it was sent in, contrary to the practice of that body. In the House of Representatives both Democrats and Republicans joined in the indorsement of the appointment. This is what the Republican leader, Mr. MANN, said of this appointment:

"Mr. Speaker, in this connection and in behalf of this side of the House I desire to congratulate the President and the country upon the appointment of Francis Burton Harrison to the high position of governor of the Philippine Islands. I believe that no better selection could have been made out of the entire population of the United States, and that the action of the President is a guaranty to the country that the Philippine question will receive careful and honest consideration.

"The American people may well accept the judgment of the present Governor General as to the capacity of the Filipino people. Reasoning from that judgment, we have apparently come to the point when the Filipino people may properly ask the Congress of the United States to enact a bill now recognizing Philippine independence.

INDEPENDENCE WILL BENEFIT AMERICAN TAXPAYERS.

"I said at the beginning of my remarks that the granting of independence, which is demanded by your duty toward the Filipino people, would also be to your financial interest, and this I am prepared to prove. True it is that if the Philippines were free there would be fewer and ultimately no American officeholders in the islands; true it is also that there would be more difficulty for certain American trusts in 'cornering' our products; but it is also true that the American people would not have to bear the burden of fortifying and defending the Philippines, an undertaking which costs not a cent less than $40,000,000 yearly, millions which, although rich people like you can well spare, should be spent in this country or left in the pocket of the American taxpayer. Your separation from the Philippines will at once relieve you of the only weak point where you could easily be stricken in case of war.

"There are those, however, who assert that by holding the Philippines you get the benefit derived from having a market for your surplus and a field wherefrom you can buy your needed tropical products. Why should you lose your trade on account of our national freedom is more than I can comprehend. If our trade is profitable to you now, why should not it be when governmental ties between us are cut? Is it perchance because while under your control you are taking undue advantage of us? No; certainly not. Is it because our trade is regulated by laws mutually beneficial to us? Why can not the same trade regulations be established by treaty between the Republic of the United States and the Republic of the Philippines? If you give the Filipinos their liberty, there will be nothing that they will not gladly concede to you. You will have not only their trade but their gratitude, and you will not only benefit yourselves and them but you will have given then the last touch to the work for the liberation of mankind you began in 1776. America's flag may then cease to fly over our public buildings, but her influence will be our inspiration, and we and our children will bless the day when Dewey entered the Bay of Manila."

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come when I ought to make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will not do that yet.

Mr. DONOVAN. You are overdoing this thing. We have listened all this afternoon, and not one word has been said on the subject matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to yield to the gentleman from California 10 minutes, otherwise it may be fatal. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to speak on the bill H. R. 9017, transferring the control and jurisdiction of Alcatraz Island and the buildings thereon from the War Department to the Department of Labor. I will read the bill:

A bill (H. R. 9017) transferring the control and jurisdiction of Alcatraz Island and its buildings thereon from the Department of War to the Department of Labor.

Be it enacted etc., That Alcatraz Island and all its buildings thereon, now under the control and jurisdiction of the Department of War, and now used as and known, designated as, and called the United States military prison on Alcatraz Island, Cal., be, and the same hereby is, transferred to the Department of Labor, to be used by the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, the said Alcatraz Island and all its buildings thereon to be hereafter under the exclusive control and jurisdiction of the Department of Labor.

The bill was amended by the Committee on Military Affairs, and, as amended, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Alcatraz Island and all buildings, machinery, and improvements thereon, now under the control and jurisdiction of the Department of War, and used for and known as the Pacific branch, United States military prison, on Alcatraz Island, Cal., be, and the same hereby is, except as herein otherwise provided, transferred to the Department of Labor to be used by the Bureau of Immigration as an immigration station or for such other uses as may be provided for by law. The said Alcatraz Island, together with all buildings, machinery, and improvements thereon, shall be hereafter under the exclusive control and jurisdiction of the Department of Labor, subject to the provisions of the act of Congress approved September 28, 1850, providing for a lighthouse at Alcatraz Island.

The amendments were in accordance with the departments' recommendations, both War and Labor.

This bill has been thoroughly considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and the object and purpose of it is to transfer Alcatraz Island and the buildings thereon now used for a military prison to the Department of Labor for an immigration station. The island is about 2½ miles from San Francisco, and there are buildings on it that have cost the Government $756,356.64. These buildings are in splendid repair. The island is at the entrance of Golden Gate, where every one sees it as they enter. It is in plain view of the exposition grounds and about 1½ miles distant. It has been used for a military prison since 1864. The War Department has maintained a military prison there, but they realize that they can maintain them cheaper on the mainland. These convicts for smaller offenses are sent there, while the convicts for severer offenses go to McNeill Island and Fort Russell. This will cost the Government not 1 cent. It simply transfers it to the Department of Labor for an immigration station.

The buildings will be ready to be used at once by the immigration station. The immigration station is now located on Angel Island, some distance from San Francisco. They have there wooden buildings, and while it is a nice location, it is wholly insufficient. It is now used for Asiatics and others, but when the canal is opened there will be a great influx of immigration, and the idea is that this island and the buildings be turned over to the Department of Labor.

I want to call the attention of the House particularly to the fact that the War Department asked for this transfer, and it has so reported. The Bureau of Labor wants the island and the buildings for an immigration station. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported favorably upon the bill.

It is now upon the calendar, and at the first opportunity I get—to-night, if I can—I am going to ask if the House will not permit the bill to be taken up and passed, so that it can go to the Senate, to the end that the Department of Labor may begin work at once upon the arrangement of their plans out there, to have the thorough use and benefit of these magnificent buildings, that will otherwise be unused.

Alcatraz Island is in the Bay of San Francisco, Cal., about 2 miles from the mainland and in a direct line with the Golden Gate. It has been occupied for many years by the Department of War as a military post, and more recently as a United States military prison. The prison building was authorized in the sundry civil act for the fiscal year 1908, and appropriations therefor were made in that year and the years 1909 and 1910 in the aggregate of $250,000.

The buildings are in fine shape, have separate compartments, and provisions for each room, with ventilation, and I have been advised by the Commissioner General of Immigration, who has gone all over the United States, that so far as use for that purpose is concerned there are no buildings anywhere in the United States better equipped.

I want to call attention particularly to the fact that here is an expenditure of some $700,000 that can be turned over and used by the Immigration Service. It is estimated that the cost of the labor of these prisoners on the work was $191,498.20. The military authorities have been contemplating the withdrawal of the prisoners from the island for a number of years. It was felt that they could be transferred to the mainland, and the cost of administration would be materially reduced. The transfer contemplated by this bill will mean a saving to the Government of a considerable sum each year, so far as the military establishment is concerned, to say nothing about the great saving to the Government of using it as an immigration station instead of going and buying land and buildings that will cost half a million or more, and that would not be as good as these buildings that we have already got.

It will be necessary to have an adequate immigration station to meet the necessities of the situation. The buildings on Alcatraz Island are fireproof, sanitary, and modern in every respect. If these buildings were to be continued as a military prison, there is no doubt that the Government would be compelled to construct additional buildings on Angel Island for the use of the Immigration Service at considerable cost to the Government.

I desire to get that fact fully before the Members of the House. At practically no cost or expense, the Department of Labor is ready to take charge. They are anxious to do it; and we would like to have it in shape at as early a date as we can. I trust the Members of the House may see their way clear to permit this bill to go through.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is that to take care of the Asiatics that the gentleman expects to come into California? If not, where are the immigrants going to come from who will use this station?

Mr. RAKER. They claim now that there are 200,000 who have already engaged their passage and paid for it to land in San Francisco in 1915 from Europe. No Asiatic. We want them excluded for all time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They must be a pretty prosperous class if they engage their passage two years ahead.

Mr. RAKER. We are advised that that is the fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suppose that is because of the great era of prosperity that this country is going to enjoy under this Democratic administration.

Mr. RAKER. I think so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And news of it has already spread to the innermost points of Europe?

Mr. RAKER. I do not believe there is any doubt about the prosperity.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is not that true?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. But is it not because in two years they know that there will be another administration?

Mr. RAKER. No. Look back to the beginning of immigration, and the gentleman will see that when there was no prosperity in this country and hard times were upon us, immigration was low; but whenever prosperity is great the immigration runs up from 750,000, and this year it will be 1,300,000. It will be more next year. All you have to do is to look at the records of immigration, and it gives an indication that the people from the Old World, when they learn of prosperity in this country and learn of its splendid conditions and opportunities, come in in perfect streams. But when times are hard they do not come. There is no question about it on earth.

Mr. CANTOR. They go the other way.

Mr. RAKER. Certainly. The following letters were received from the War Department by me on this subject:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, October 30, 1913.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: I have received your letter of the 24th instant inclosing copy of bill introduced by you transferring the control and jurisdiction of Alcatraz Island from the Department of War to the Department of Labor.

This matter is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the War Department, with which the proposition originated. Our department has taken no action with respect to the subject, and I do not feel, therefore, that it would be proper for me to submit any comments on the bill at this time.

Of course, if the chairman of the committee to which the bill has been referred requests the department to submit, through the Speaker of the House, in accordance with Rule XLI of the House Regulations, a report on this proposition, the matter will be gone into in due course.

Very truly, yours,

A. CAMINETTI, Commissioner General.

The War Department and Department of Labor made full reports on this bill, and both reports were favorable and are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 11, 1913.

To the CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The department is in receipt of request of October 28 for information and remark on H. R. 9017, a bill for the transfer of the control and jurisdiction of Alcatraz Island and its buildings thereon from the Department of War to the Department of Labor.

2. More specifically, the object of the bill is to transfer the Pacific branch of the United States military prison, located on Alcatraz Island, Cal., to the Department of Labor for use as an immigrant station. The antecedents of this proposed legislation are the following.

3. In a report of inspection made by the Judge Advocate General in the month of July of this year, the history is given of the establishment of Alcatraz as a place of confinement of military prisoners, as follows:

"PACIFIC BRANCH, UNITED STATES MILITARY PRISON, ALCATRAZ ISLAND, CAL.

"The earliest use of Alcatraz as a place of confinement of military prisoners of which I have been able to find any record was in 1861–1863, during which period a temporary wooden prison was constructed there as a measure of necessity growing out of the Civil War. In the fall of 1867 the wooden prison appears to have been replaced by one of brick. It has been in continuous use as a military prison from 1861 to the present time. The island is situated in the Bay of San Francisco, is an irregular oblong in shape, rocky and precipitous on all sides, rising to a height of 136 feet above tidewater, and destitute of vegetation. It has an area of 11.9 acres. It lies directly in the path of commerce, and surmounted as it is with the rather conspicuous new prison building, is perhaps more prominent in the view of the incoming passenger and more the subject of his inquiry and that of residents and visitors generally than any other object in the harbor. The answer they receive, that it is a prison for the confinement of our military offenders, gives an impression of the character of our enlisted personnel and of the discipline of our Army, which is unfair and unjust to the service. In pursuance of the act of March 12, 1907, which authorized the Secretary of War to designate branch prisons which, equally with the military prison at Leavenworth, would be subject to the laws relating thereto, Alcatraz was on March 22, 1907, designated as the Pacific branch of the United States military prison.' The sundry civil act of March 4 of the same year carried an appropriation of $50,000 for reconstruction, followed by an additional appropriation of $100,000 carried in the sundry civil act of May 27, 1908, and a further appropriation of $100,000 carried in the sundry civil act of March 4, 1909; or a total reconstruction fund of $250,000, as against $583,000 and $60,000 appropriated about the same time for the reconstruction of the main prison at Fort Leavenworth. The reconstruction work at Alcatraz is complete. The prison there, like the one at Fort Leavenworth, is the individual cell type, admirable in all its appointments and furnishing accommodations for 600 prisoners."

4. The objections to Alcatraz as a military prison were stated as follows:

"It is somewhat difficult to understand how the War Department came to recommend and Congress to appropriate the large sum of $250,000 for a new prison building on such a site as Alcatraz. Legislation then in force had laid so many restrictions upon the use that may be made of indoor prison labor (manufacturing) and upon the purchase of the products of such labor, that it was even then impossible to find continuous indoor employment for prisoners, and the necessity existed then as now for extensive facilities for outdoor employment. Modern penology demands such outdoor employment on other grounds, and I understand that considerations of this character are ordinarily controlling at the present time in the selection of sites for penitentiaries. These considerations apply with much greater force to military prisons than to civil prisons. At the time of my inspection of Alcatraz I found that practically all prisoners confined there who were not needed in the domestic administration of the prison were kept on Angel Island in a stockade and employed in the new barrack construction now going on at that island; also that the custom existed of transporting them back and forth between Alcatraz and other points in the harbor for daily labor as required. The expense involved constitutes an additional objection to Alcatraz as a prison site."

5. In respect to the availability of the branch prison at Alcatraz as an immigrant station, report continues as follows:

"I inspected Alcatraz on July 11 in company with the Commissioner General of Immigration and the local commissioner, and upon completion of our inspection of Alcatraz we looked over the present immigrant station at Angel Island. I am authorized by the Commissioner General of Immigration to report to you that he is of the opinion that Alcatraz, lying as it does directly in the path of commerce, surrounded by deep water, and within reasonable distance of the mainland, is admirably situated for the purposes of an immigrant station; that the prison constructed would, with slight alterations, lend itself admirably to the immigrant service; that the cell system was unobjectionable, and even appropriate and necessary for certain classes of immigrants received on the western coast; that the barrack room was admirable in all its appointments for the higher classes of immigrants. Practically all the auxiliary buildings necessary to the immigrant service are found at Alcatraz, and ample quarters for officials of that service. The objection urged in this report to Alcatraz as a site for a military prison would not be an objection to a site for an immigrant station, but rather an argument in its favor."

6. The report concluded with the following recommendations:

"I should have no hesitation in recommending the abandonment of Alcatraz if there were available in the harbor of San Francisco buildings which could be adapted for the purpose of a military detention barracks without too much expense. The commanding general of the Western Department (Gen. Murray) was of the opinion that Old Fort Point would prove an admirable location for a detention barracks, and could be adapted at small expense. At his request I inspected this post and found that the site was partly occupied by the Lighthouse Service, which, in my judgment, has more space than it needs for the operation of a single lighthouse. I found ample space for the confinement of detentioners from our western posts. At my request the constructing quartermaster is preparing estimates of the expense of adapting these casemates to the purposes of a detention barracks and will submit them to you upon your arrival in San Francisco on July 31. The advantage of Old Fort Point as a site for such a barracks is that it is located on the mainland in reasonable proximity to the large garrison at the Presidio, where the detentioners could be employed on fatigue work, with space within reasonable distance for outdoor instruction.

* * * * * * *

"In the event a suitable location on the mainland for a detention barracks can be found in San Francisco I recommend further that the authority of Congress be sought for the transfer of Alcatraz to the Department of Labor for utilization as an immigrant station."

7. What is said above represents the attitude of the department toward the proposed legislation on the subject to-day. The buildings on Alcatraz constitute model detention barracks, and the sole objection to continuing it as such is, first, the sentimental one that its prominence in the harbor advertises in a way unfair to the military service the discipline of the Army, and, second, the more substantial objection that there are not only no facilities for outdoor drill and instruction of prisoners confined therein, but prisoners must be transferred considerable distances in order that that part of their sentences relating to hard labor may be carried into execution.

For the reasons above stated and for the further reason that great economy to the Government will result I recommend the transfer of the present military establishment on Alcatraz Island to the Department of Labor. It will furnish that department with admirable facilities for the conduct of its Immigration Service.

In view of the great amount of money which the War Department has expended in the building up of Alcatraz, and the further fact that the modification of Fort Winfield Scott will amount probably to $50,000, it is requested, in case the transfer is authorized as herein recommended, that this amount be transferred to the War Department from the appropriations for the Department of Labor, in order that the War Department may be put to no additional expense in the preparation of a suitable establishment at Fort Winfield Scott. I believe this is an entirely reasonable and proper request, in view of the fact that the transfer of Alcatraz to the Department of Labor will result in a saving to that department of at least $500,000.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. CAMINETTI: My statement to you that the transfer of Alcatraz prison would be germane to section 2 of S. 1032 was based upon the theory that legislation transferring the prison was germane to legislation under which the prison had been created and existed. It seems to me that this must be conceded. I do not know, however, that we are called upon to decide that question. If you have prepared a letter in relation to H. R. 9017, you might conclude it with the suggestion that H. R. 9017 might be handled as a separate enactment or incorporated in section 2 of S. 1032, leaving it to the committee of Congress to judge of the advisability and propriety of such incorporation.

Sincerely, yours,

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

HON. A. CAMINETTI,
Commissioner General of Immigration,
Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 4, 1914.

Hon. JAMES HAY, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Some time since you referred to this department for report copy of a bill (H. R. 9017) introduced by Mr. BAKER, entitled "A bill transferring the control and jurisdiction of Alcatraz Island and its buildings thereon from the Department of War to the Department of Labor." The preparation of the desired report has been delayed until full opportunity could be had to investigate the situation and ascertain whether or not the proposed transfer of jurisdiction would adequately meet the necessities of the Immigration Service.

The present immigration station for the port of San Francisco is located on the north side of Angel Island, a distance of about 6 miles from the city, necessitating quite an expenditure for the operation and maintenance of ferry service. The remoteness of the station makes the transaction of the public business burdensome and expensive, owing to the loss of time in going to and fro. The buildings, with the exception of the power house, are constructed of wood, and unquestionably constitute a constant danger to the occupants, owing to their inflammable character; the topography of the island upon which they are situated is such as to render almost impossible a convenient arrangement of the existing structures or of those which might be erected in future. It is conceded by all who have knowledge of the situation that it would be an unwise investment to make further improvements and expenditures for facilities at the present site.

On the other hand, Alcatraz Island is far superior to Angel Island, both in point of location and in the facilities situated thereon. While the principal buildings were primarily designed for military purposes, they are strong, well built, and those that could be used for housing immigrants as well as for administrative purposes are either fireproof structures or reasonably so convertible, and they can be adapted to immigration purposes by the expenditure of an amount of money small in comparison to their original cost. The main building, which is capable of housing 600 or 700 inmates, is not excelled for sanitary and hygienic conditions by any public building in the United States, and is wholly fireproof.

This island is convenient to the city of San Francisco, being only 1½ miles from the northern water front thereof and is easily reached; but it should be remembered that the operation of a ferry would still be required, although the number of trips could be doubled if necessary, thus avoiding the long delays that now consume the time of those who have business at Angel Island, and also minimizing the dangers incident to navigation in stormy weather.

Contrasted with the present location and facilities, the proposed transfer of jurisdiction of Alcatraz presents a well-marked improvement; in fact, there is no comparison between the two properties, and I would have no hesitancy in recommending, in lieu of any further expenditure of funds on improvements at Angel Island, that the matter of transfer to Alcatraz be made the subject of favorable action.

I desire to add, however, that I would have preferred to see the new immigration station for the port of San Francisco located upon the mainland, provided a convenient site was available, although it must be admitted that many excellent reasons have been assigned in favor of Alcatraz Island as a suitable location. Suggestions made that a portion of either of the two United States military reservations situated in or near the city of San Francisco be secured have proved unavailing, as the War Department has recently stated to a representative of this department that no space on either the Presidio or the Fort Mason reservation could be spared. Taking advantage of a suggestion made in an address by Capt. Robert Dollar, on my recent visit to San Francisco, with a view to the location of the new station upon the mainland, this department has gone to the extent of seeking the cooperation of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, with which Capt. Dollar is associated as chairman of the foreign trade committee, with the result that after due deliberation by that body, its vice president and general manager, in transmitting the views of the chamber, says:

"While there are many reasons which would favor a location on the mainland, it is our understanding that the tender by the War Department of Alcatraz Island for this purpose offers to the Immigration Service the most feasible and available site. We are sure that the present location on Angel Island is inadequate and inconvenient, and it would be a great step in advance to utilize Alcatraz Island for the purpose, and I am therefore instructed by our board of directors to express our opinion that Alcatraz Island would get rid of many of the disadvantages that now obtain at the present location. This opinion is expressed without prejudice to any other sites which may hereafter be considered on the mainland."

Capt. Dollar, in discussing this report, adds his approval of its contents as follows:

"I called a meeting of the directors and members of the chamber of commerce, at which time this subject was discussed at length. * * * I have read the communication sent from the chamber as a result of such meeting. I approve of the action taken."

The department is not unmindful of the great cost involved in securing a site on the mainland in a large city like San Francisco and constructing the necessary buildings and accommodations thereon, and it is that fact, not the least among many favorable considerations, that influences it in agreeing to the transfer of the present station to Alcatraz Island, where, to a great extent, in addition to sufficient land, all wants of the Immigration Service, with few exceptions, can be immediately provided for at comparatively small expense. Among the exceptions can be noted a hospital suitable for a station intended to accommodate both oriental and occidental immigration.

It is proper to suggest that involved in the transfer there is necessity for an immediate appropriation in the sum of $44,[illegible]0 for the purpose of placing the buildings at Alcatraz Island in condition for use by the Immigration Service, a considerable proportion of same being necessary for transforming the section now consisting of cells in the buildings hitherto used as a military prison. It is understood that the transfer can not be effected from the present station until these necessary changes have been completed, and unless appropriation therefor is made there would be no authority in law for this department to incur the expenditure for same.

The department is informed that by act of Congress approved September 28, 1850, providing for a lighthouse on Alcatraz Island, the Lighthouse Establishment has certain privileges thereon. The bill now pending before your committee might properly be amended so as to make the transfer subject to the rights of the Lighthouse Service on the island.

The department, as at present advised, suggests the following amendments to this bill:

1. Strike out from the title the words "its buildings" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "buildings, machinery, and improvements."

2. Strike out, in line 3, page 1, the words "its buildings" and in lieu thereof insert "buildings, machinery, and improvements."

3. Strike out, in lines 5 and 6, same page, the words "as and known, designated as and called the United States military prison on," and insert in lieu thereof "for and known as the Pacific Branch, United States Military Prison."

4. Strike out, in lines 8 and 9, the words "and naturalization" and insert in lieu thereof "as an immigration station or for such other uses as may be provided for by law or regulation approved by the Secretary of Labor."

5. Strike out small letter "t" in the word "the," line 9, and insert in lieu thereof capital "T."

6. Strike out, in line 9, the words "and all its buildings" and insert "together with all buildings, machinery, and improvements."

7. Line 7, after the word "is," insert "except as herein otherwise provided."

8. Strike out period after the word "Labor," in line 11, and insert the following: ", subject to the provisions of the act of Congress approved September 28, 1850, providing for a lighthouse at Alcatraz Island."

As thus amended, and with the comments above submitted, this department recommends the passage of said measure.

In connection with the foregoing, and in view of the fact that the suggestion to transfer Alcatraz Island to this department for use as an immigration station originated in the War Department at the suggestion of Brig. Gen. E. H. Crowder, Judge Advocate General of the Army, I deem it my duty to transmit herewith a copy of a letter addressed by Gen. Crowder, on February 28, to the Bureau of Immigration, and to state that as to the method of such transfer, whatever shall be deemed advisable by your committee will be entirely satisfactory to this department.

Respectfully,

W. B. WILSON, Secretary.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington, June 19, 1914.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: Referring to your inquiry over the telephone this morning as to the total cost of reconstructing the military prison at Alcatraz Island, Cal., I have the honor to inform you that funds were appropriated for this purpose in the sundry civil acts for the fiscal years 1908, 1909, and 1910, as follows:

Fiscal year 1908	$50,000
Fiscal year 1909	100,000
Fiscal year 1910	100,000
Total	250,000

The several acts making the appropriations for this work provide that the sum appropriated shall be so expended as to give the maximum amount of employment to the inmates of said institution.

The records of this office show that the estimated cost of the labor of prisoners on the work in question is $191,498.20, which amount, it is thought, should be added to the $250,000 to obtain the actual cost of reconstructing the prison, making a total of $441,498.20.

Very respectfully,

J. B. ALESHIRE,
Quartermaster General.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 13, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for our great country—for its organization, its resources, and its possibilities. We thank Thee for its abundant harvests and for the bountiful supplies of divine grace and providence that have marked its progress from the beginning. We praise Thy name for every token of Thy favor that has exalted our Nation. Grant that we may have a due consideration of our responsibility and measure up to our opportunities. May we follow Thy leading, rely upon Thy power, and cherish Thy precepts. May we continue to abide under the shadow of the Almighty. "Lord God of hosts, be with us yet, lest we forget, lest we forget." We plead for this in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD RAILROAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 7, 1914, a report concerning the financial transactions of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., together with a transcript of the record made in this investigation in accordance with a further Senate resolution of June 24, 1914. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Senate has already passed a resolution authorizing the printing of that report and the accompanying evidence as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was not aware of that.

Mr. NORRIS. We have passed a Senate resolution to print the report and the evidence as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the report and the accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. NORRIS subsequently said: Mr. President, did I understand the Chair to refer the communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Committee on Printing? As I understand, there is no occasion for referring it to that committee, in view of the previous action of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where would the Senator from Nebraska have it referred?

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, there is no occasion for any reference. The Secretary of the Senate will have it sent to the Printing Office, where it will be printed, the same as any other document. It has already been ordered printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was of the impression that if it had been ordered printed the Committee on Printing would send it to the Printing Office to have it printed.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the Committee on Printing only reports such matters back to the Senate, and the Secretary of the Senate then has it sent to the Printer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it has been ordered printed——

Mr. NORRIS. It has been ordered printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no idea how it will be printed.

Mr. NORRIS. Just the same as any other document. It will be sent to the Printer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate to a matter of a somewhat personal nature. I received this morning a letter from a friend containing the following statement:

> This is to advise you that a number of your opponents in south Georgia are trying to arouse prejudice against you in rural districts and among the voters by repeating to them a great story about your having voted to keep a negro in office over a white man, having reference to a negro judge in Washington.
> I know you had a reason, and a reasonable one, for casting your ballot that way, and I wish, if you can, you would furnish me with the proper statement to offset this tale.

As Robert H. Terrell is the only negro who has been confirmed by the Senate, this story must refer to him. I ask leave to bring together in one place what the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows with reference to the nomination and confirmation of Robert H. Terrell.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 18, 1914, shows:

Executive nominations received by the Senate.

Robert H. Terrell, of Washington, D. C., to be judge of the municipal court of the District of Columbia. (A reappointment, his term having expired.)

On April 24, 1914, the RECORD shows:

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate.

JUDGE OF THE MUNICIPAL COURT.

Robert H. Terrell to be a judge of the municipal court of the District of Columbia.

On May 2, 1914, page 7621 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, appears the following:

CONFIRMATION OF ROBERT H. TERRELL.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my vote on the confirmation of Robert H. Terrell as a judge of the municipal court of the District of Columbia be made public. I desire it to be known that my vote was cast against his confirmation.

On June 18, 1914, the RECORD shows that unanimous consent was given to publish the vote of all the Senators with reference to the confirmation of Robert H. Terrell. The vote was as follows:

YEAS—39.

Brady	Cummins	Lewis	Shively
Brandegee	Gallinger	Lodge	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Goff	McCumber	Smoot
Burleigh	Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Sterling
Burton	Hughes	Nelson	Thomas
Catron	Johnson	Norris	Thompson
Chilton	Kenyon	Page	Walsh
Clapp	Kern	Pomerene	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Root	Weeks
Crawford	Lane	Shafroth

NAYS—24.

Bankhead	Lee, Md.	Reed	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Newlands	Robinson	Smith, S. C.
Fletcher	Overman	Sheppard	Thornton
Gore	Owen	Shields	Vardaman
James	Pittman	Simmons	West
Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

I have now, Mr. President, put together everything that the RECORD shows with reference to the nomination and confirmation of Robert H. Terrell.

Of course we understand that all nominations are considered in secret executive session, that no record is made of the speeches of Senators in secret executive sessions, and that even the votes of Senators are not made public and do not appear in the RECORD except by unanimous consent.

I feel, however, that I am justified, in view of the unanimous consent given at my request that my action with reference to Robert H. Terrell be made public, to add that all Senators who were present are aware of the fact that during the two and one-half months the nomination of Terrell was held up in the Senate I on every opportunity protested against his confirmation, and spoke frequently at length against his confirmation. I, of course, voted against his confirmation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understood the letter, it was giving an account of what happened in executive session with reference to the confirmation of a judge.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was a charge that I voted for his confirmation.

Mr. BORAH. I merely wish to ask the Senator if he does not agree with me that executive sessions with reference to the confirmation of judges ought to cease, and that the confirmations ought to be had in open session? If we are going to state what has happened after the session is over, there is every reason why executive sessions should be done away with, so far as those matters are concerned. This only illustrates the proposition that we ought to terminate executive sessions entirely with reference to everything except some possible treaties with foreign Governments.

INDUSTRIAL CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a couple of newspaper clippings, one of which I should like to have read. I have clipped it from the Iron County Register, a prominent, influential Democratic journal in Missouri, and it seems to have been copied from the St. Joseph Observer, another strong, influential Democratic journal. I think it would be very well to make this the basis of some similar matter that I purpose to insert in the RECORD from time to time for the edification and comfort of my friends the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and some others. I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Unique industry furnishes occupation for a large number of men and women and shows handsome profit to makers.

Jefferson City.

Corncob and wooden pipes——

Mr. STONE. If the Secretary will turn to the other side of the paper he will find what I asked to have read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the subject the Senator's correspondent was dealing with is a very important one. It is important that the corncob and wooden pipe industry should flourish in this country. I think it ought to be read.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to have it read.

Mr. STONE. You can have it read if you wish, but I do not know what it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The other side of the paper will be read.

Mr. STONE. That is not the article that I sent up to be read. I think it would be well for the Secretary before he begins to read to know what it is that a Senator desires to have read.

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand that the Senator has something with which he wishes to brace up the courage of his colleagues and will not tell us the subject of it?

Mr. STONE. No, sir; it is something with which I wish to brace up the courage of the lamentators on the other side.

Mr. WARREN. I think their courage will be sufficient for the occasion when the time comes, as the Senator will probably find. The boys often whistle when they go through the woods to keep their courage up. I notice that these little ebullitions of whistling and singing come often nowadays from the Democratic side, and we enjoy it, I am sure. We hope the other side will devote itself diligently to overcoming the alleged "psychological depression."

Mr. STONE. I hope the Senator at least enjoys it, since he has so much occasion to employ it.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it seems to me the thing to settle is whether we shall have the corncob-pipe article read, or the article that the Senator from Missouri wants to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The article was not marked in any way. So the Chair does not think the Secretary is to blame for what he started to read; but it was not what the consent of the Senate was given to have read. The article on the other side of the corncob article the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Camden, N. J.: Riot follows application of 1,150 men for 400 jobs advertised by the Joseph Campbell Co. August 10, 1908.

Denver: More than 200 Bulgarians petition governor for employment or aid to return to Bulgaria. March 20, 1908.

Detroit: More than 2,000 men march to city hall to solicit work of mayor. January 28, 1908.

Granite City, Mo.: Fifty men kneel before various churches pleading for work. One man killed himself because he failed to obtain work. April 25, 1908.

New York: School children besiege the restaurant of Adolph Lorber to obtain free meals offered by Mr. Lorber. February 13, 1908.

New York: Government urged by Central Federated Labor Union to let contracts for subway to furnish work for 500,000 men unemployed. March 15, 1908.

Philadelphia: Loan of $9,000,000 to provide funds for public work asked by the city for unemployed. Race riot followed demonstration of unemployed demanding work. Italians attacked by men of other nationalities.

San Francisco: Organized unemployed league formed. Demands the issue of $23,000,000 in bonds to aid unemployed. January 28, 1908.

Toledo: One thousand Hungarians march through the rain to receive a loaf of bread each. March 28, 1908.

Such is a part of the story of the winter that followed the panic of 1907. Democratic policies to blame? Not a bit of it. Republicans had been in power for 11 years. Democratic President to blame? Not a bit of it. Theodore Roosevelt was in the White House. Democratic Congress to blame? Not a bit of it. The country was safely standpat. Democratic tariff law to blame? Not a bit of it. The law of Dingley still prevailed.

Explain the panic of 1907 as you will—say it was a bankers' panic; say it was a result of a "psychological condition." It was a "condition." It was a condition that prevailed under a Republican President, and at a time when Republican legislation framed to foster prosperity was still upon the statute books. If the Democrats are panic makers, they have not yet been able to duplicate the winter expert at their line. They have not of 1908. As a matter of fact, history shows that the Tory press forgets a lot when it assails the new tariff laws and the new currency law as panic breeders. While they are organizing a "business depression" the standpat politicians should stage a few bread riots to give a realistic touch to their show.—St. Joseph Observer.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have here an editorial which I clipped from the Washington Post. As we all know, the Washington Post for months past has filled its columns with direful prophecies of hard times and of evil to come. But even the Washington Post is awaking to the fact that the country is in excellent industrial condition and that we are moving rapidly along the path of industrial development and progress. I think it wise to insert in the RECORD this confession from the editorial columns of the Post. In order to economize time, as it is half a column or thereabouts in length, I will merely ask to have it inserted instead of having it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The article referred to is as follows:

GREAT CROP YIELDS WILL INSURE LARGE BUSINESS.

So much depends upon the crop results for this present year that the country watches with anxiety the climatic conditions of each week in the corn and cotton belts and in the wheat section of the Northwest and Canada.

The winter wheat results are now well assured and the yield will surpass by many millions of bushels the highest record of production ever attained in the United States.

Cotton has made excellent progress during the month of June, and this last week has been notably favorable in the entire cotton belt; so much so that many speculative holders of cotton have been sellers, believing that the yield will be well up to high record mark.

Reports from the West and Southwest as to corn are of a character that promises a remarkable yield, the late rains having worked wonders in the growth of the plant; and it is easily to be seen that the agriculturists in the corn belt will not be surprised if the yield of corn makes fully as fine an aggregate in comparison to yields in former years as has the winter wheat.

The business men of the country should be greatly encouraged by these brilliant prospects for immense crops, as these yields of cotton and corn, if of the aggregates now estimated, will furnish the soundest and most reliable basis for general prosperity in business affairs of the United States.

The news from the West, including Southwest, Northwest, the Middle West, Central West, and far West, is that the railways will be called upon for full capacity of cars and motive power to transport the products of the soil.

That means that Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Alabama iron and steel plants, furnaces, and coke ovens will be called upon for greater outputs.

That means that West Virginia, Virginia, and Kentucky coal mines will have a demand that will call for employment of greater numbers of miners.

That means that the industrial districts of the United States will resume activities and be able to dispose of larger outputs than during the past two years.

The prosperity of the farmers and the greater activity in the manufacturing sections will insure larger demands upon the merchants in every city and town of the United States, and by the middle of August this will be fully demonstrated, and it will make a great change for better business in every part of the Republic.

The section of the Union comprising Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, and the District of Columbia will be among the first of the sections to feel the returning tide of good trade, and local sentiment as to business will be largely changed during the next three months.

Mr. STONE. That is all I shall insert this morning, but I think I will take occasion morning after morning to furnish my friends on the other side with some comforting evidence of the real condition of the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if we go into that and the Senator's friends on this side submit editorials and excerpts from newspapers showing a different condition of things, it occurs to me that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will not be a fair index of the proceedings of this body, but an omnium-gatherum of the opinions of newspapers scattered throughout the country. The Senator knows that the Democratic papers are, of course, trying to make it appear that we have prosperity. The Republican papers, on the other hand, say we have not prosperity, but the contrary. I think it is a questionable practice to fill up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with such newspaper extracts.

Still, if the Senator wishes to go into it, his friends on this side will accommodate him by inserting articles of a different tenor, and we will let the numerous readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD decide which represents the true facts.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have a clipping which I should like to have read for its psychological effect upon the business world, to say nothing of the quieting effect it may have upon the Senators on the other side.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

BUSINESS BOOM BRINGS BIG ORDER FROM PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

ALTOONA, PA., July 8.

With every department of the Altoona shops, the industrial center of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., working full time and many departments working overtime, this city is enjoying an unsurpassed era of prosperity.

An order for 81 freight engines, the largest ever used by the Pennsylvania, has been placed with the Juniata shops, while an order has just been placed with the car shops for 1,000 all-steel box cars, the most costly equipment of its kind ever ordered by the railroad.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, while I asked to have it read for its psychological effect, it may also be appropriate as a plea of set-off or recoupment to articles read by Senators on the other side, with which this contrasts the business conditions of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, pursuing the same line I shall ask permission to have the Secretary read an editorial in the New York World of Sunday, June 28, entitled, in rather high-flown language, "When big business is an ass."

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator was not heard in this part of the Chamber. Will the Senator state what the article is?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have asked to have the Secretary read an article in the New York World of Sunday, June 28, under the graphic title "When big business is an ass." I think it will have some effect "psychologically," as that seems to be the adverb chiefly now in use.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the editorial from the New York World of Sunday, June 28, 1914, as follows:

WHEN BIG BUSINESS IS AN ASS.

Our neighbor, the Sun, upon whom we are accustomed to rely for a correct interpretation of the political sentiment of Wall Street, bitterly complains that—

"The business world feels itself fettered by the general attitude of political hostility to the higher mechanism of business, a hostility of which the President is the principal exponent."

If the Morganized finance which resulted in the Claflin failure represents "the higher mechanism of business," we have no doubt that the President is hostile to it.

If the plunder of the New Haven Railroad represents "the higher mechanism of business" we have no doubt that the President is hostile to it.

If the almost incredible financial knavery that has been brought to light in connection with the Rock Island represents "the higher mechanism of business," we have no doubt that the President is hostile to it.

If the sort of finance that wrecked the Frisco and broke the back of the Pere Marquette represents "the higher mechanism of business," we have no doubt that the President is hostile to it.

If the corrupt manipulations that were exposed in the lobby investigation represent "the higher mechanism of business," we have no doubt that the President is hostile to it.

If sneaking attempts to intimidate Congress by means of form telegrams and mimeographed letters represent "the higher mechanism of business," we have no doubt that the President is hostile to it.

What is more, the country is hostile to it, and whenever the issue is definitely drawn the President will win and big business will be beaten.

With every economic question that has come before him the President has sought to deal prudently, cautiously, and sanely. No word of demagogy has fallen from his lips. He has indulged in no reckless agitation; he has made no incendiary appeals to popular passion; he has neither denounced, nor abused, nor threatened. He has sought to carry out no economic policies that he was not elected specifically to carry out, and yet the great business interests of the East have fought him at every step with every weapon at their command. He offered them peace, and they have chosen war. Having chosen war, they can expect no truce until the issue is decided.

They themselves have created a situation in which there is nothing for Congress to do but to go ahead with the administration's program and carry it through. Big business in politics is usually an ass. It was never more of an ass than when it undertook to bulldoze Woodrow Wilson and this Democratic Congress.

JOHN HENRY GIBBONS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I introduce a bill, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (S. 6072) for the relief of John Henry Gibbons, captain on the retired list of the United States Navy, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In connection with the bill which I introduce I desire to have printed in the RECORD a statement which appeared in the Washington Post yesterday by Richard Harding Davis on the subject. I had expected to make some remarks on the bill at this time, but I simply ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FATE OF CAPT. GIBBONS, "PLUCKED" FROM NAVY IN HIS PRIME, CRUEL ERROR WHICH DEMANDS REDRESS, DECLARES RICHARD HARDING DAVIS.

[By Richard Harding Davis.]

Before this article was written I had sent a letter to former President Roosevelt, asking him to let me tell what I believed he probably thought of Capt. John H. Gibbons, who, two weeks ago, was retired from the Navy by the plucking board.

Col. Roosevelt's answer arrived after this article had been sent out, but his letter requires no context.

This shows us Capt. Gibbons, as Theodore Roosevelt, when President of the United States, knew him.

Eager and generous, it shows us also something of the man who wrote it, who, deep in his own affairs, which are the affairs of many millions of people, found time to answer a signal of distress from a shipmate in trouble.

COL. ROOSEVELT'S LETTER.

This is Col. Roosevelt's letter:

OYSTER BAY, LONG ISLAND.

DEAR DAVIS: While I was President, and therefore Commander in Chief of the Navy, Capt. Gibbons served under my personal eye, and I am able to speak from first-hand knowledge of his conduct and efficiency. I saw him in command of the Dolphin; I saw him in noncommand positions on other ships; I saw him in the Navy Department at Washington, and I consulted him about questions of equipment, direction, and general policy in naval matters. In every position he showed himself to be a man of marked efficiency—one of the most useful men in the Navy; one of the men who, as President, I should, in the event of war, have been delighted to see in a position of responsibility and command, because I was well assured that in such a position he would bear himself fearlessly, efficiently, and honorably.

From the standpoint of the country I regret very greatly that there is any danger of our losing his services. I am,

Faithfully, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

ORIGIN OF THE PLUCKING BOARD.

Fifteen years ago promotion in the Navy was so slow that officers did not attain high rank at an age when they best were fitted to wield it.

So Congress enacted that each year, unless 40 officers, by resignation or death, left the Navy, as many as would make up that number of vacancies must be forcibly retired. The duty of eliminating them was given to a board of rear admirals, known as the board on selection for retirement, or, more familiarly, as the plucking board. The idea was to get rid of the dead wood. But last year and this the plucking board has shown that either already it has cut down the dead wood, and to obtain its annual sacrifice must lop off living boughs, or that it does not know dead wood from green.

Last year it eliminated Capt. Templeton Potts, a most efficient and capable officer, against whom nothing could be urged, except lack of sea service. To this Capt. Potts has replied that he repeatedly asked for duty at sea, but was ordered by the Navy Department to serve on different boards on shore. Accordingly, for no other reason apparently than that he obeyed the orders of his superiors, the plucking board dismissed him from the Navy

This year the plucking board has eliminated officers of such value to the service that hereafter undoubtedly the plucking board itself will be eliminated.

SECRETARY DANIELS'S REGRETS.

When he announced the names of those ordered out Secretary Daniels said that since he had taken charge of the Navy Department it was the most unpleasant duty he had been called upon to perform. In the list of those he retired he said he recognized some of the most efficient officers in the service.

"There should be some method by which officers will be able to reach higher grades," said the Secretary of the Navy, "while they are yet young enough to be of real service. But the present method is too cruel. The retirements to-day are tragedies. I think this is the last plucking board the Navy Department will call together."

For the appreciative and sympathetic attitude of Secretary Daniels in this matter those who consider the plucking board a menace and who believe, for the good of the Navy, it should go, are grateful.

But removing a judge from the bench because he has condemned innocent men is not enough. If the innocent men still remain in prison, punishing the judge will not help them. If the plucking board has cast into outer darkness efficient officers, men the Navy wants, men for years trained and drilled in her service, who are her loyal and devoted servants, not only should the plucking board be "plucked," but the men who have been so unjustly humiliated should be restored to duty; not only in justice to them, but for the "good of the service." The Navy can not afford to lose them. She can not at the age of their greatest usefulness throw them on the scrap heap.

Just as each year the value of a battleship decreases, the value of the man who commands a battleship grows; his blow is heavier, his experience is more widely gathered, his ability and judgment have been put through severe tests; each day, considering him merely as a machine, he has increased in power, output, and efficiency. His growth in discipline, loyalty, in devotion to his country may be taken for granted.

CAPT. GIBBONS'S RECORD.

Of those officers plucked this year, except by reputation, I know but one. He is Capt. John H. Gibbons, until a few days ago in command of the battleship Utah. And to illustrate the kind of man the plucking board sees fit to "recall," I would like to remind the readers of the Post of his record

Thirty-five years of his life have been given to the Navy; eighteen and a half years of that time have been spent at sea. This is sea service proportionately equal to or even greater than that of the five rear admirals who condemned him. In all the wars in which our country has engaged since Gibbons joined the Navy he has taken an active part. He saw service in Cuban waters at the battle of Manzanillo and the bombardment of Morro Castle; in the Philippines, where he commanded the gunboat General Alva, and after a fight rescued from the Filipinos a party of American soldiers and hundreds of Spanish prisoners; in China during the Boxer revolution; and in Vera Cruz, where on shore he commanded the fighting forces of the Florida, Arkansas, San Francisco, Chester, and of his own dreadnaught, the Utah. For two years he was our naval attaché in London. He was good enough for both Mr. Taft and Col. Roosevelt. Under each he commanded the Dolphin, the Navy vessel assigned to the use of the President.

For three years he held a position which is one of the most responsible in the service, that of the superintendent of the Naval Academy, the man who trains and teaches our future admirals and who sets them an example. For his services at that post, by both Secretary Meyer and Secretary Daniels, Gibbons was most heartily praised, and also by the president of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, Herbert L. Satterlee, a former Secretary of the Navy.

When Gibbons was in command of the Detroit she won the gunnery trophy; when he was in command of the Charleston she won the gunnery trophy. As long ago as the hurricane at Apia, Gibbons, then a junior lieutenant was commended for leading his men up the shrouds of the storm-driven Vandalia and forming a life sail, thus helping to save the lives of the crew and the life of the ship.

When the Navy was policing Vera Cruz, Gibbons was on shore in command of 3,000 bluejackets. But when he returned to the Utah, during the two months before he was ordered to home waters, he did not visit the plazas nor loiter under the portales. With the exception of one evening, when he dined at the Diligencia, if you wanted to find Gibbons you could find him only on his ship.

Three weeks ago, when the Utah came north, I had the privilege of returning with her and of sharing the captain's mess. As a junior officer on different warships and as our attaché in London for 17 years, I have known Gibbons, but I had never before seen him in command of a dreadnaught. And what I saw of him in that capacity led me to write this.

At a safe distance I have followed the sea service for 20 years, and when I say I know few captains smarter than Gibbons, more efficient, more intelligent, physically more alert and fit, in habits as temperate, in mind and thought as kind, sane, and conservative, I echo only what all the officers of his wardroom said of their captain. And they see him at first-hand; their lives as well as those of 1,100 bluejackets, and property worth $14,000,000 are, or were, in his keeping. They ought to know, and what they think of him ought to count.

During the passage home Capt. Gibbons did his own inspecting, his own navigating. In dungarees he crawled through manholes and down oily ladders; in thick or fair weather he spent his time upon the bridge. His mind was always on his job. When at dinner the marine would spoil my best story by announcing that somewhere on the horizon a suspicious-looking oyster boat had appeared or that the officer of the deck wanted to make it 8 o'clock, Gibbons would give that fact as grave consideration as though the orderly had told him a hurricane was approaching under forced draft or that the German Navy was in our course and cleared for action.

DAMPER ON AMBITION.

When last I saw Capt. Gibbons as I left the Utah at Tompkinsville the fog and rain were dripping from his oilskins. The entire night he had spent upon the bridge; and the following morning, without a pilot, he docked his ship at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Twenty-four hours later he opened a telegram and found he was dismissed from the Navy.

As he went down the gangway in the clothes of a civilian his shipmates, still in uniform, saw him leave them with eyes that were blurred with angry tears. For them the scene was the essence of injustice and ingratitude. For them it was both a mockery and a menace. What hope did it hold out for their future? They saw a man in the prime of life, who had held with honor three of the highest posts in their profession, thrown out, as you would throw out a drunken cook. What incentive for unceasing vigilance, study, and risk of life did it leave with them? What lesson did it teach to 800 midshipmen at Annapolis to whom Gibbons, their commanding officer and their friend, had been the living promise of what after 30 years they might hope to attain?

Secretary Daniels is determined the plucking board must go. That is good, but it is not enough. It has robbed the Navy of a man the Navy needs, and the people of a good and faithful servant. An act of Congress, with the recommendation of the President, can return Capt. Gibbons to his ship and to the service. He is a man "who never sought an honor or shirked a duty." His country can not afford to lose him. It can not afford to wrong him.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $260.68 to pay Joe H. Norris for salary for per diem and traveling expenses while performing the duties of supervisor of Indian Schools October 21, 1912, to November 11, 1912, under instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHIVELY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,200 to pay Ryford Long, jr., for indexing and extra services as clerk to the Committee on Pensions, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

Rutledge, administrator of Adma Tuono, be paid to Jane Johnson Ball, administratrix, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—ALMAR F. DICKSON.

On motion of Mr. BRANDEGEE, it was

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOSEPH T. JOHNSON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
JAMES W. GOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I desire to state, in reference to the conference report which has just been read, that it is exactly the same as the report made on a former occasion. The conferees on the part of the two Houses have been unable to agree on the question of mileage for Senators and Members of the other House. I present the report a second time, in order that each of the two Houses may have another opportunity to express itself on this matter, and take such order in the premises as it sees fit to take.

So far as the Senate conferees are concerned, they feel practically, indeed distinctly, instructed by the Senate to adhere to the existing law. It is a recognized principle in matters of this sort in all legislative bodies when there is an existing law and one House proposes to change it, that the House proposing the change must yield, unless the House to which the proposition is made is satisfied with the change. The Senate has expressed its disapproval of the provision of the House of Representatives in this bill, which is a change of existing law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the chairman of the committee definitely state precisely what the House proposition is, if they have made any proposition?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The House have made no proposition, except to allow Senators 5 cents a mile for traveling to and from Washington at each session of Congress. So far as the House is concerned, they insist on the provision contained originally in the bill, which is that Members of the House shall receive for mileage what they actually expend for themselves and the dependent members of their families; in other words, the proposition of the House is to establish one rule for the House and a different rule for the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Have they undertaken to define the term "dependent members of the family"?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There has been no effort to define that provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that the proposition is to have one law for the Senate and another law for the House of Representatives governing this matter?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is the proposition of the House, but if the Senate sees fit to do so it might recede from its amendments and concur in the House provision, which would put both Houses on the same plane, the Members of each to receive actual traveling expenses for themselves and the dependent members of their families. If the Senate should see fit to recede from its amendments numbered 1 and numbered 30 and accept the House provision, it would leave the bill go to the President with the provision that the same measure of compensation for mileage shall be applied to both Senators and Members of the House; that is to say, actual expenses for themselves and the dependent members of their families.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Is it within the power of the conference committee to determine who constitute the "dependent members" of the family of a Member of Congress, and so prescribe a rule that we may know what that term means? I think it is too vague. If it were made definite, I would be disposed to think it a proper solution.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I take it for granted that if Congress saw fit to do so it might insert a provision defining who shall constitute the dependent members of the family of a Member of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Would that be within the province of the committee of conference?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The committee might accept the House provision with an amendment making that definition. I think that would be competent.

Mr. BORAH. I think a provision of law so indefinite and uncertain as that would be as bad as the other proposition has been pictured to be. If the matter is to be passed upon, it ought to be made definite. I am opposed to paying the expenses of a retinue of dependents.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. So far as I am concerned, I have no other function except to carry out the wishes of the Senate in this matter. It is exceedingly distasteful to me, and I know it is to all Senators, to have an important bill like this tied up on account merely of a difference on the question of mileage to the Members of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if a definition were to be made of the term "dependent members of the family," would it not likewise be necessary to define precisely in what style a Senator or Member of the House should travel—whether he should have a lower berth, or an upper berth, or a section, or a seat in the smoking car, or some other perhaps more sumptuous way of traveling? Would it not lead to inextricable difficulties along that line unless that phrase were defined?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, my opinion is that the provision inserted in the bill by the House is exceedingly objectionable. As has been stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], it is vague and uncertain and might open an opportunity for unwise practices which would bring great criticism on the Members of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am going to venture a suggestion to the chairman of the committee. Having had some experience in these matters myself, I find that the House conferees are quite apt to say that we do not take a record vote on these questions in the Senate; that the Senate perfunctorily says "we disagree to the amendment." My suggestion to the Senator is that on this matter my impression is that it would be well to have a record vote, so that it might appear precisely what the attitude of the Senate is.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the motion that I will submit is that the report be adopted and that the Senate further insist on its amendments numbered 1 and numbered 30.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Will the Senator excuse me for a moment, until I can get before the Senate exactly what I wish to present in connection with this report?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I rose to ask the chairman of the committee if it were not within the province of the conference committee to determine the number of members of the family of a Senator or Representative who may travel at the expense of the Government? Would it not be a very satisfactory settlement of this matter to fix that number and let the mileage be fixed at the actual expense of traveling?

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I wish to say that this matter, it seems to me, is a subject before Congress at nearly every session. It has provoked a great deal of discussion and acrimonious criticism; it has entered into the political contests of many Senators and Representatives for many years; and I think it ought to be settled now and for all time, if such were possible of accomplishment. Personally, if I may be permitted to make the suggestion, I think it would be satisfactory to say that the actual expenses, in accordance with the amendments which the House proposes, is all that should be charged against the Government, and I wish the committee would take that view of the matter and settle it for all time. Like Banquo's ghost, the mileage question is perpetually coming up for consideration. It is a trifling, inconsequential, little thing, and I think it would be wise if the committee would fix the number of the family that might travel, say, a Senator's or Representative's wife and himself, or, so far as I am concerned, I would be willing to confine the expenses to the Representative and Senator alone. Really, I should prefer the proposition which limits the payment of mileage or expenses to the Senator or Representative. After considering the matter more materially, I hardly see how we could with propriety provide for the payment of the traveling expenses of the family. But, Mr. President, it is a small matter and of little concern to me personally; but I want the matter settled, and settled now.

Mr SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to ask the chairman of the Appropriations Committee if the Senate conferees made any proposition to the House conferees along the line of a compromise?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say, Mr. President, that we did not make any proposition of compromise, nor do I feel disposed to make any now. I am the agent of the Senate, and will execute any order the Senate sees fit to give, but the Senate conferees thought that the law which has been in force since the foundation of the Government and which is the law of the land now could not be changed by the House alone. The House has proposed the change, the Senate has declined to agree to that change, and we stand on the law and on the action of the Senate which has been several times expressed. If the Senate sees fit to change the instructions which it has given with practical unanimity—there were perhaps not more than two or three dissenting when the vote was taken the last time, whereby the Senate decided to abide by the law as it exists—it is, of course, within the power of the Senate to do so.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. There need be no trouble about changing the mileage rate if the Congress sees fit to do so in the usual, practical, legal way, and without violating the rules of legislation. I perhaps have been as strenuous as anyone in the effort to preserve the dignity and the rights of the Senate, to have legislation enacted in legislative bills and not in appropriation bills, and to have appropriations made in a clean, orderly manner, and according to the rules.

While I have believed and I still believe we should not change this rate at this time, I stand ready at any time, if a bill comes to us in the regular way, to do away with mileage entirely or to make it any other sum. Here, however, is a law that has been on the statute books, with only slight alterations, since the beginning of the Government, and the amount of per mile allowance has not been altered at all. For some 75 years every Senator and every Member of the House of Representatives has drawn this mileage. All our illustrious predecessors in both Houses have drawn this mileage, though none was obliged to accept or use it. There has been, so far as the annals of history record, not a single case of troublesome conscience or of effort toward economy sufficiently strong that any Senator or Representative has failed to draw in full his mileage. I see no reason why, in this, if not illegal, certainly disorderly, way we should at this time make this change, and especially when on the House side, on every vote that has been taken there, as the RECORD shows, on a division the majority has favored retaining the law as it stands; and it is only when a roll call is ordered that the opposite side has been able to carry the matter by 10 or 12 votes, as the RECORD discloses. I may say, further, that many of those who have answered to their names on one side of the matter have favored the other side when in private conversation.

Mr. President, it would be strange, indeed, if, after all these years, we should now for the first time accuse all of those who have gone before of extravagance or "graft." When talking of criticism, if anyone believes that we shall ever reach the utopian condition where we shall not be constantly criticized in the Senate, and for that matter in the House as well, the sooner he is disillusionized the better, for such condition will never come to pass. You see nothing of consequence in the newspapers about this controversy in regard to mileage. You hear nothing of it, unless it is from some penny-a-liner who wants to create a little sensational color and who seizes upon the question of mileage as he would upon the salary and calls it a "salary grab," and so forth.

When it comes down to the original proposition of the House, of actual expenses, et cetera, the House has since withheld it from the Senate, and, as the chairman has so well said, has proposed as the only alternative to give the Senators mileage, one trip at 5 cents a mile, while the Members of the House take actual expenses for all the dependent members of their families.

It so happens that with the average age of the Members of the House, and the conditions there, the amounts they would draw would be quite different in comparison from the amounts drawn by Senators. Looking over the list of members of their families demonstrates that perfectly.

Now, who is to say what actual expenses are? There are men sitting in this body who, when they travel, travel in a sleeping car and in a drawing-room. Another Member of the same body will occupy but a single upper berth. Upon arriving here the Senator certifies that he paid so much for his transportation in a Pullman car. It goes to the Vice President for his approval. Shall we put the Vice President of this body in a position where he must pass upon every porter's fee every time a Senator's boots are blacked, his tickets, his meals, and determine whether or not each is a proper expense; and shall we furnish him with necessary clerks, and shall the House have the same, to check up and audit these innumerable little items and accounts? Who is to say who may compose the dependent members of one's family? Shall we include the nurse who must travel with wife or children in ill health or dependent upon the service of such assistant? Shall we include the servants who for years have been dependent members of the family, who always travel with the family and minister to their wants? Shall we include a father, a brother, a son, a mother-in-law, or a sister? Shall we include a father or brother who has served in the war, who is drawing a pension which in part may support him, and who a Member of Congress feels should be considered as a member of his family, and whom such Member may take pleasure in supporting? Shall we put all such relatives, although they may have some means of their own and yet be mainly supported by a Member who feels obligated toward them both in honor and affection in the list of dependent members of his family because he contributes to their support? Or shall we oblige him to cut them all off, although they may accompany him from place to place and live with him here in Washington or at his home?

I am prepared to admit that it sounds persuasive to say "actual expenses," but what Cabinet member has ever found it practicable, where actual expenses are provided for servants of the Government who travel on official business, to really keep track of or impose actual expenses as such? Why, Mr. President, almost invariably where such language occurs and actual expenses are provided for, the head of the Government department makes a ruling that so much per diem may be expended in lieu of subsistence, and so forth. Were it otherwise, Mr. President, an army of clerks and auditors would be required to make up the accounts of the pennies here for street-car fare, the quarters there for cab hire or baggage, and the various other little items incident to travel.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, is it not possible that the policy of abolishing mileage has behind it the element of necessity? Is it not possible that we are obliged to economize in that way, and by shaving down the expenses of traveling officials, and possibly the salaries of clerks and employees, in order to get money enough to buy the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and investigate certain other lines of so-called river and harbor improvements for which certain localities are clamoring, for we can not do both, perhaps?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator might mention the expenditure of $50,000,000 in Alaskan railroads that the Government proposes to build.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I might name the Alaskan railroad, where, however, we get a quid pro quo for our money; where we get property which belongs to Uncle Sam for the money we expend. It is possible, however, that we may need it for that purpose; so I suggest that there may be an element of necessity behind this matter. We must cut down these things or we can not get the money to spend elsewhere.

Mr. WARREN. I am congratulating myself that I stand upon the same general plane as the distinguished Senator from Colorado, whose words always illuminate a subject. I am ready to do away with mileage entirely whenever the House shall send us a bill, in the proper way of legislating, changing a law some 75 years of age; but not in this manner. In fact, I do not believe the conferees in this case have the power to say just what shall be the items of expenses that shall be approved under the House proposition of actual expenses. The conferees can not have any more power than the Senate itself has; and when a Senator on this floor proposes an amendment to change existing law, without the backing of either an estimate or favorable report from a standing committee, and enact new legislation, he is immediately called down because what he proposes is general legislation. Certainly the agents of the Senate have no more power than the Senate itself has.

It seems to me the motion made by the chairman of the committee should prevail and the matter should go back to conference, to be settled in the proper way—the way in which these matters always have been settled in conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course if there were no mileage, we would have a condition of unequal salaries paid Representatives and Senators. It would be perfectly unjust to the State of Colorado, to the State of Texas, to the State of Arizona, to the State of New Mexico, or Washington or Oregon that their representatives in the two Houses of Congress should be paid less than the representatives from Maryland or Virginia; and if we had no mileage, of course they would be paid less. So the idea of abolishing mileage conflicts with the primordial law of justice and of equality. There ought to be, as nearly as practicable, absolute equality of compensation.

If it can be arrived at, of course it ought to be, as nearly as possible, the precise expenses of the Senator or the Congressman who comes here. The trouble, however, about saying that in so many words in a statute is about what the Senator from Wyoming has called attention to. One man would travel in one way and one man would travel in another, and you would have to have a question of each man's accounts; so it is just as important that the matter should not be indefinite as it is that it should not be unjust and unequal. It seems to me that if this matter goes back to conference, the conferees upon the part of the Senate might very well agree to meet the House half or third or quarter way and agree to a mileage of 10 or 15 cents instead of 20 cents, as it is now.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Everybody knows that that is more than the expense of the travel; and if you are going to make an allowance in excess of the actual cost, I do not see why you should not adhere to the rule which has prevailed for 75 years. It would not take 15 cents, or 10 cents, either, to pay a Senator's mileage to Washington and return.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senator from Virginia; but speaking for myself, the Senator is mistaken. It depends upon the size of a man's family.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is exactly the point. It depends on the size of his family. I said "a Senator's mileage." In my judgment and speaking for myself alone, I think you would as well make allowance for boarding the family after they get to Washington as to take that into consideration in determining the mileage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. Now, Mr. President, I have heard that argument, too. I am greatly in favor of the family idea in this world. I think the man who has five or six or seven children is entitled to some degree of consideration on that account. I think the man who brings his wife with him to Washington and brings his children with him to Washington is entitled to some degree of consideration on that account. I do not agree that a Senator or a Congressman stands alone in this world without wife and without children. I think they are a part of him, and that if you could bring it down to accuracy, determination without room for dispute and scandal, the House has selected a very good measure of compensation; that is to say, the actual expenses of the Congressman or Senator, together with the dependent members of his family.

The thing that troubles me about that, however, is deciding who are to be counted as dependent members of his family. If the provision went a little bit further and said "his wife and dependent minor children," then there would not be any doubt.

My mileage does not pay my expenses and those of my family to Washington and back. That is perhaps my misfortune, or perhaps my merit. You may call it whichever of the two you please. At any rate, however, I do not travel very frequently without my family. I prefer to have them with me, and I think it is better for everybody to have them with him. I think people ought to be encouraged to have their families along.

Ten cents a mile would not cover the average Senator's expenses to and from Washington with his dependent minor children and his wife, and 15 cents would barely cover it; 20 cents, as a rule, will more than cover it. It has to be rather a large family for it not to cover it.

I hope when the matter goes back to conference the Senate conferees will meet the House conferees upon some common plane. I would not have it as the House has it, because of the indefiniteness, because of the fact that somebody must audit the accounts, because of the possibility of scandal growing out of it, one man pretending to have spent a great amount of money coming to Washington and the other having spent only what he needed to spend. One man will travel at the public expense as cheaply as he would at his own expense, and another man will travel at the public expense at twice what he would at his own expense. So I do not think the House has started out on the right idea. I do think, however, that the amount of mileage which we receive at present is more than is ordinarily, upon the average, necessary for the traveling expenses of a Senator and his wife and minor children to and from the Capital; and I do think that his wife and minor children ought to be considered just as much as he is, and that is not a question, as the Senator from Virginia says, of whether you pay their board after they come here. The Senator has to do that already, and, of course, that naturally reduces his compensation below that of the man who has never been brave enough to go out and marry a good woman and take care of her and see her through the world in the proper way.

I think the matter should go back to conference, so that the Senate may express its idea and the House its idea. I think, of course, that the House notion of putting Members of the House upon one footing and Members of the Senate upon another is simply absurd. We can not tolerate that. So the whole matter must go back to conference, and I want merely to express the hope that the Senate conferees may meet the House conferees, say, one-fourth of the distance of difference at any rate, and make the mileage for the future, say, 15 cents each way, or perhaps even 10 cents each way.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly to see that the Senator from Mississippi has departed so far from the old Jeffersonian principles of government that he is advocating at last upon the floor governmental support of the families of the officials of the Government, because, talk as you will, this mileage adds so much to the compensation, and whenever you give one dollar extra because of the size of a family the Government is contributing that much to the support of the official's family. It is a vicious proposition to introduce into any free government, and I sincerely hope the chairman of the committee will stand out against any such proposition as this coming from the House.

The Senator from Mississippi has not answered the proposition of the Senator from Virginia that there is just as much reason for the Government paying a portion or all of the rent of the official's family, because if a man has seven children he has to rent a larger house for them, his expenses are heavier, his board is heavier, his necessary cost of living is more, and the same reason that would justify us in asking the Government to support our families in bringing them from our homes to the city of Washington would justify us in asking the Government for a further contribution to support them during the time they are here. Men support their families according to their means, and they gauge their expenses according to their ideas of economy. Those who can afford to do so will have more luxuries and comforts than those who can not afford to do so, but when the Government pays for them you may be sure that they will all have the equivalent luxuries. There will be very little difference, indeed, as the Senator must know.

I hope the Senate will not adopt a system of this kind. Every Senator who is fit to represent the Government can take care of his own family, and if he can not take care of and support his own family he had better stay home. This country is not a monarchy; it has no royal family whose extravagances are to be loaded upon the people, and we do not want an official royal family whose living expenses, board, or traveling expenses are to be assumed by the American people.

One word about the amount of the mileage, and the 20 cents per mile which is accorded to Senators, and which adds considerably to the compensation of those living a great distance from the Capital. When you balance up the matter finally there is very little difference in compensation. No man can properly represent his people and remain two years away from his home State. He must go back several times, especially under our new system of double elections. He must meet his constituents; he must confer with them; and it makes a vast difference whether he has to go over to Baltimore to go home or whether he has to go to San Francisco. I will guarantee that there is not one of the western Senators whose expenses in traveling back and forth on occasions where it is his duty to go to his home State will not equal or exceed the amount of compensation he receives in the way of mileage; and this independent of the traveling expenses of his family. So, taking it all in all, it works out approximate justice.

I simply desire to express again my most earnest hope that we will not introduce a new system of official family support for the officers of the United States. If we think that 20 cents a mile is more than it should be, then cut it down, make it less; but it ought to be exactly what the expense would be to a Senator, irrespective of his family, because, by whatever name you see fit to call it, it is compensation added to his salary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator did not understand me as wanting to put it upon a family basis in the law. I merely argued that 15 cents, as a rule, would cover family expenses; that is, of wife and dependent children. For that reason I thought that would be a fair amount, as I supposed the Senator understood.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if under the parliamentary situation this mileage question can be eliminated from the bill? If that is the case, I desire to make a motion to strike it out.

Mr. HUGHES. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator desires to offer an amendment which has that purpose in view, very well.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will answer the question of the Senator from Alabama by stating that the plan he suggests might be adopted if the Senate proposes to ignore the law which is on the statute books and fail to appropriate the money that the law requires shall be appropriated. We have a law on the statute books which provides that each Member of Congress shall receive 20 cents a mile for each mile he travels going and returning at each regular session of Congress. That is the statute law, and the committee feels that it is incumbent upon it to appropriate to meet that obligation which is imposed by law.

Mr. President, I will follow it with a motion after the Senator gets through, but I simply answer the Senator's question now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I only wanted to know if a motion such as I have intimated would be in order.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It would not be in order, Mr. President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to say in defense of this motion, if I am permitted to make it under the rule, that I am in favor of the law as it stands. I shall vote for mileage as it now is and has been for a great many years. But, Mr. President, I have had so much experience and observation on this question of mileage that I think it ought to be settled in some way. I confess in making the motion I have suggested it might be regarded as a little bit wicked on my part. I should like to see the motion adopted; I should like to see the matter stricken out of this bill, so that I could go to another House and watch some of these economists faint. I have no doubt, Mr. President, a careful observer would see some gentlemen on this side turn very pale. This matter ought to be settled. We ought to knock it out. I think perhaps that would be the best thing to do. Then at the next session of Congress it might be reinstated perhaps. But if I am not permitted to make the motion, if it is not in order, of course I will not make it. I would like to have the sense of the Senate in some way in order that we might get the sense of another body in some way that would go right down to what they really mean and want.

Mr. SHEPPARD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state his inquiry.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is not the motion of the Senator from Alabama in order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that it is not in order.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I undertood the Senator from Alabama to propose an amendment to the bill as it passed the Senate, and that is certainly not in order. If I understood the Senator correctly, his motion would not be in order.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it proper at this time to move that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment? In my judgment, that motion is not only proper but is a preferential motion, and I offer it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not consider such a motion as that in order. The bill has passed——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us see what the motion is. The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] moves that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Omit the matter inserted by the House amending said amendment, omit the matter stricken out and inserted by said Senate amendent, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"For mileage of Senators, $51,000: Provided, That after the fiscal year 1915 no mileage or other allowance for expenses in attendance on sessions of Congress shall be paid to any Senator, Representative, Delegate from a Territory, or Resident Commissioner."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that is not a preferential motion. It could only be preferential if it simply proposed to recede from the Senate amendments. That is the only way it can be considered as a preferential motion. Furthermore, the amendment would not be in order at any time as it is written.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I will say that it seems to me perfectly plain under all parliamentary law that a motion that will bring the two Houses together is not only in order, but is preferential.

Mr. WARREN. The Senate has ruled upon it time and again. It was ruled upon in the House several times last week. A preferential motion can only be a simple matter of receding.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I should like to explain my object in offering this amendment, although it is hardly necessary for me to explain my object after what was stated by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I believe the present system of drawing mileage about as fair a one as could be established. I do not profit by it to a great extent, for my mileage is infinitesimal, and I do not care anything about it. I have frequently voted for the present system of mileage, because it gave additional compensation to some Members, and, in my opinion, no Member of the House or the Senate is overcompensated now. Substantially it works a rough sort of justice, and I am perfectly satisfied with it. But I am eternally tired of the constant recurrence of this question and the effort on the part of certain gentlemen to make political capital at the expense of others. I do not think it is a spectacle at all elevating to the country to see the House and Senate continually bickering over this matter of mileage. It is a question upon which gentlemen should vote their convictions, and the spectacle we are constantly seeing of men voting one way in the RECORD and another way on a division, and voting in the RECORD one way and lobbying Members of another House to offset the effect of that vote, is a bad thing. It is a bad thing for the country. It is a cause of general criticism which includes not only those who should be included in it but men whose position on this matter is the same as their position on every other matter. I sincerely hope that it can be put an end to.

My proposition is that mileage shall be paid to Members of the House and Members of the Senate for the ensuing year just as it always has been paid. The argument is made occasionally that Members were elected with the understanding that they would receive this mileage, and that any attempt to change it now would be an interference with practically a contract right. So far as the House of Representatives is concerned, this amendment meets that objection. So far as the House is concerned, every man will receive the amount for his mileage to the end of his term under the law that under the law it was supposed at the beginning of the term he would receive, and Senators will receive mileage the same as the mileage of the House just so long as the House itself receives mileage, and then, after 1915, we pay no mileage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the proposed amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is not in order. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. The House of Representatives passed an appropriation bill containing certain items with reference to the compensation of Senators and Representatives for mileage. It came to the Senate, and was amended in the Senate, and then went to conference, and the question is before the conferees for settlement or determination, unless the Senate recedes from its amendment. The amendment here proposed is legislation that has to do with the future, and has never been considered in the Senate, and the sense of the Senate has not been taken thereon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I make the motion that the report be adopted and that the Senate further insist on its amendments numbered 1 and 30.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate further insist.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to ascertain on which motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw the demand.

Mr. NORRIS. On the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But he has made two motions. One is to agree to the conference report which has been agreed to by the decision of the Chair. The next motion is that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not ask for any further conference. Let that come from the House, if they desire it. My motion is simply that the Senate further insist on its amendments numbered 1 and 30.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that motion I think we ought to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and vote "yea."

So the motion of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 6, 13, and 140 to the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending July 30, 1915, disagreeing to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the bill and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I realize, of course, that this is the regular way in which to proceed with matters of this kind, and in what I have to say I do not wish to reflect upon any Senator; but my understanding has been at all times that when conferees are appointed by the Senate or by the House of Representatives they are appointed with the idea that they will stand by the action of the body which appoints them.

The bill appropriating funds for the Indian Service contains some provisions which were very bitterly opposed by Senators who would naturally act as conferees on the part of the Senate on that bill. I have learned that since the bill was passed here there has been an effort made on the part of a Senator to persuade the House to oppose the action taken by the Senate.

The Indian bill was the subject of long consideration; there were embodied in the bill some radical changes in existing law. It was believed that those changes were for the benefit of the Indian Service; but it is idle, of course, to assume that those changes will be agreed to in conference if the Senate conferees are opposed to the Senate action.

I say this, I repeat, without any desire to reflect on anybody; but it has occurred to me that it would be embarrassing for Senators who are opposed to provisions in the bill and who do not propose to maintain them in conference to act as conferees on this measure. I realize that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has opposed one of the provisions of the bill, and yet I am perfectly confident after talking with him that he would insist on the position taken by the Senate. I have no complaint to make about his position as a conferee.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have listened with interest and attention to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. In the inception of his remarks he stated that some of the Senators who would probably compose the conference committee were "bitterly" opposed to some of the amendments which were placed in the bill by the Senate. Speaking for myself, I think the RECORD will disclose that I voted only against one amendment, and in no sense did I "bitterly" oppose the same; although I thought then, I think now, and will aways think, until my mind is changed by proper evidence and argument, that the so-called Mississippi Choctaw amendment was not a wise and proper amendment. But, Mr. President, my individual view as a Senator is submerged and lost when I become a conferee; and I wish to state to the Senate, if such an assurance is necessary on my part, that I am in good faith for all the amendments that the Senate put on the bill.

The Senator from Michigan, of course, is not oblivious to the fact that since the so-called Mississippi Choctaw amendment was put on by the Senate the House of Representatives, another body of this Congress, has declined to concur in that amendment. The question upon which I presume the Senate conferees may at some time ask advice and instruction from the Senate is, How long shall we insist upon that Senate amendment, and shall we insist to the extent of killing the bill? I would not do that; but I again, in conclusion, say that I am for all the amendments adopted by the Senate, because, as a conferee, I am the servant of the Senate and my individual opinion must be subordinated to the will of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have felt that that would undoubtedly be true so far as the Senator from Arizona is concerned, and yet I regret very much that he thought it was necessary to declare that he was opposed to that provision now, because it certainly will weaken his attitude as a conferee, for it is due notice served upon the House of Representatives that eventually that point will be yielded. I am, however, more interested in certain other provisions of the bill, which seem to me to go to the very vitals of our conduct of Indian affairs; and having heard, I think from good authority, that a certain Senator, who probably will be on the conference committee, has bitterly opposed them, not only at the time the bill was up here, but has been active in the House, it is worse than a farce to have a conference composed of men who are not in sympathy with the provisions of the bill, which has taken so much time to prepare and which received so much attention in the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan if he meant to state, as I understood him to state, that Senators who, according to the custom of the Senate, will be managers of the conference on the part of the Senate, have been to Representatives in the House to oppose the amendments which they are to advocate as Senate conferees?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have been so informed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the Senator made his statement, at first I simply understood him to state that certain Senators had been to Representatives urging them to stand against certain Senate amendments; but if it is so that the Senators who have been urging Representatives to attempt to defeat the Senate amendments are Senators who are to be named as conferees to maintain the position of the Senate, I should myself think they were not in a position to enter a conference, which, under the rules, has to be what is called a full, free, and fair conference. If they have been instigating Members of the House to oppose what they are going to advocate as Senate conferees, I can not conceive that they could properly perform their functions.

I am astonished to hear such a statement made, and I, for one, would not vote for a motion to make Senators conferees if I thought they had been urging the people with whom they are to confer to persist in their opposition to the amendments which they say they are for, as representatives of the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a minute?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. A statement has just been made which would tend to insinuate that some conferee to be appointed by the Chair on this bill has been working with some Member of the House to induce a disagreement to some of these amendments. I want to say here again in the most emphatic terms, and I hope the Senator from Connecticut heard me say a moment ago, that while it is true I voted against the so-called Mississippi Choctaw amendment, I did so in pursuing a line of thought on the subject that I have followed since I have been in the Senate. If that disqualifies me from being a conferee, very well. I also stated that since the Senate had, by two roll-call votes, favored the distribution of a part of that fund to the Mississippi Choctaws, I would steadfastly and in good faith urge that amendment in conference. I object to, take exception to, and resent any insinuation or suggestion that I, if I am the person meant as one of the conferees, am going to do other than act in good faith and resolutely try to carry out the orders of the Senate. I want that to be understood here and for all time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to answer a statement the Senator from Arizona made about me; but I will yield if the Senator from Michigan thinks he can do it better.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I do not think that I can, but I think the Senator would be better able to understand the situation after I have made the statement. I have not even insinuated that the chairman of the committee had taken that attitude or that he had consulted with any Member of the House or that he had taken any other position than the one he has stated. I so expressed myself when I spoke the first time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator so to express himself, and I did not understand the Senator from Arizona to say that the Senator from Michigan had insinuated anything about him. I did understand the Senator from Arizona to say that he regarded what I had said as an insinuation that he would not do his duty as a member of the conference committee. I made no such statement. I made no such insinuation. I did not refer to the Senator from Arizona at all. I do not know who the Senators are who would be, under the custom, conferees upon this bill. My statement and my knowledge is based solely upon what the Senator from Michigan has just stated here on the floor, which is that he understands, and, if I get his language correctly, he is credibly informed, that Senators who would be liable, under the custom of the Senate as to the appointment of conferees, to serve as conferees, have been to Members of the House urging them to oppose what these very Senators are hereafter supposed to urge them to accept. I say that, if the Senator's statement is correct, any such Senator who is liable to be a conferee is unfitted for the post, because he can not enter the conference under a pledge to enter it for a full, free, and fair conference if he has been instigating opposition to the lip service he is going to render hereafter as a conferee.

I do not know whether those are the facts or not. I say, if they are the facts—and the conferees who are to be named will know whether or not they are the facts as relating to themselves—such a conferee ought not to serve. He ought to recognize the impropriety of his position. If he does not, there would be no use in calling it to his attention, because those are things which a man must recognize for himself. They are questions of decency and of good faith and of straightforward conduct. There would be no use in my calling it to his attention. If a gentleman does not know that it is not a fitting thing for him, representing the Senate, to go to the House and ask them to stand up against the very thing which to-morrow he is going to beg them to yield to, there is no use in my calling to his attention the fact that that is not a straightforward thing. I expect that if any conferee has been in the business which the Senator from Michigan states he has knowledge that certain Senators have been in, the perception of the fitness and decency of things will induce such a Senator to decline to act as a conferee, because if he does not, I for one would have no confidence whatever in the conference report that emanated from a Senator whose sentiments and conduct had been of that character.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have made a very hard fight in the Senate for two successive Congresses in behalf of the Mississippi Choctaws. I have received generous support from Senators upon both sides of the Chamber. Very soon after the Senate won its fight over the Committee on Indian Affairs—because that is about the way it ought to be stated—the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] came to me of his own accord and told me that he considered himself instructed by the Senate, and, with that chivalry which is one of his characteristics, told me that he would fight just as much for the Mississippi Choctaw amendment as for anything else in the bill. I have no fear in the world of any betrayal by the Senator from Arizona.

I understand, furthermore, that one of the conferees will be the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. There is no man in this body whom I trust more absolutely than he, and I know just as well as I know anything—just as well as I know that I am here—that if he felt that he ought to surrender this point he would not serve as a conferee. I have absolute confidence in him.

The other conferee, by seniority, will be the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. I have absolute confidence in him. He would not serve if he were prepared beforehand to surrender the Senate's fight.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator entirely; and if I agree that I have confidence in those gentlemen it is because I can not believe that any one of them has been guilty of what the Senator from Michigan charges.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, either the Senator from Connecticut misunderstood the Senator from Michigan or the Senator from Michigan must have been misinformed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will ask the Senator from Michigan, if the Senator from Mississippi will yield to me——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If these are the three men to serve as conferees, I know all three of them so well that I pledge my word of honor that anything of that sort hardly could have occurred.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know; but I will ask the Senator from Michigan whether or not I have misunderstood what he said, because I do not want to proceed on any misunderstanding.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, what I said and what I desire to have remain in the RECORD was that a Senator who had committed himself against the Senate bill ought not to be on this conference committee, and that I had been informed that a Senator who was liable to be a member of that conference committee had been to Members of the House immediately after the bill passed the Senate and for the purpose of working against the action taken by the Senate.

The Senator from Mississippi has mentioned the Senators. I do not wish to be invidious. It is not fair to be so. I intended to have it rest entirely upon the honor of the Senators who were to be upon the conference committee. I feel now, however, that it is necessary for me to be specific, and I shall be so now. I have learned that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], after the bill passed, was very much disappointed over the action taken by the Senate in reference to certain reclamation projects in his State, and that he had been to the House and had talked with members of that body with the hope of encouraging them in their efforts to defeat the bill.

I can not believe that under the circumstances the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] would accept a position on this conference committee. I have made this clear, although, as I said a moment ago, I had preferred to make the statement general and to allow it to rest with the individual consciences of the Members of the Senate who are to act as conferees.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this point?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I had intended, before the discussion was over, to take the floor and make the statements that I shall now make.

While the previous statements of the Senator from Michigan were general I thought it was incumbent upon me, as one of the senior members of the committee on the Democratic side, to express my views and to make a statement of what I had to say, because under the general rule of procedure I would naturally be one of the conferees.

TREATIES WITH NICARAGUA AND COLOMBIA.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me while I dispose of a matter which I should like to dispose of before 1 o'clock?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with the consent of the Senator from Mississippi. He has the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield for just a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that Senate resolution 411, which comes over from a preceding day, may be permitted to go over until to-morrow without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STONE. I should like to inquire if that is the resolution the Senator offered with respect to open hearings on the Colombian and Nicaraguan treaties?

Mr. BORAH. It is.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the action of the House of Representatives requesting a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 12570) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. MYERS. As I say, while the first statements made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] were general, I had intended, just as soon as I could obtain the floor, and after the conclusion of the running debate between certain other Members who succeeded each other with rapidity, to get the floor and make my statement.

I have no objection whatever to the Senator being specific about his statements, or charges, or whatever he may regard them. I welcome them, and was going to ask him myself to be specific if he had not voluntarily done so, or if he had not been drawn out by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

On the Democratic side of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs I am the second ranking member. I am next to the chairman. As I understand the practice and custom that would ordinarily make me one of the three conferees, as they generally take the first two on the Democratic side and the ranking member on the Republican side.

As to my interest in anything contained in the Indian appropriation bill, it has been said here by the Senator from Michigan that certain amendments which were put on in the Senate were bitterly fought and contested by some of the Senators who may be conferees on the part of the Senate. I did oppose some of those amendments. I opposed one, in particular, which relates to the interests of Montana. I opposed it to the last, and opposed it with all of my ability. I thought it ought to have been defeated, and so thought to the end. If I was bitter in my opposition I knew nothing about it. I did not intend to be bitter toward anybody who was against me, nor toward the Senate, nor toward anybody whatever in connection with it.

After that amendment, in regard to the Flathead reclamation project, which I considered most unjust, had been adopted by the Senate, I did talk in regard thereto to Montana's Representatives in the House of Representatives, Messrs. EVANS and STOUT, the Representatives of my State, who are just as much interested in Montana matters and in that particular matter as I, and explained to them what had been done in the Senate; and I feel that I had a right to talk to them about it. If there is any impropriety in that I know nothing about it.

I want to say that the only talk I had in regard thereto with any House Member was with the Representatives of my own State, Messrs. EVANS and STOUT. I did say to them that I hoped they would succeed in having that amendment defeated in the Indian Affairs Committee of the House or on the floor of the House.

I feel free to say that Montana's entire delegation—my colleague in the Senate and myself and the two Representatives in the House—have felt and still feel that that amendment is unjust and improper. I have consulted with my colleague in this body about it, and I feel that I had an equal right to express my opinion about Montana matters and matters in which we were concerned to my associates who represent the State of Montana in the House. I simply told them my view of it, discussed the situation with them, left it with them, and since then have heard nothing from it except what I have learned from reading the papers and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MYERS. I do. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor, but I yield with his consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is so long ago that I got the floor that I have almost forgotten that I had it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The subject under discussion would be as appropriate after 1 o'clock as now, because it is a conference report, as I understand. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield for a moment to permit me to introduce a bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I can not do it right now. If the Senator will wait just one second I shall be through. I have only a sentence or two to utter, and then I shall be through.

Mr. MYERS. I want to say, further, with the Senator's permission, that I will finish in a minute or two. He yielded to me for a statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the hour of 1 o'clock will come on us.

Mr. MYERS. I am about through now. I simply wish further to say that it has been my intention, were I made a conferee—and I paid no attention to that, as far as I am concerned—to stand in good faith, for any reasonable length of time, for the Senate amendments, and to do my duty according to custom and practice, as I saw it, in favor of the Senate amendments. I want to say, however, that if anybody thinks anything I have done disqualifies me from being a conferee, then I do not want to be a conferee. If the Senate thinks, under the circumstances, that I am unfit to be a conferee, or have disqualified myself, I simply leave it to the Senate. I committed no impropriety, though, in anything I have done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to add just this: I have every reason to believe that if this Mississippi Choctaw matter gets back before the House of Representatives it will meet with different treatment. Over there at first the entire argument went off upon the idea that a whole lot of lawyers sowewhere were going to get a slice out of this fund. The Members of the House, and especially my friend, Mr. MANN, seemed not to be aware of the fact that the Senate had passed a resolution cutting off every one of the contingent fees and other charges, and when the subject comes up in the House again I have every reason to believe that the House will take a different course from what it has taken up to this time. I hope the Senate conferees will insist upon the Senate amendments, and I know that representing the Senate as good, honest men they will.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As this matter is privileged the Chair recognizes the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to introduce a bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to my colleague for that purpose.

(The bill appears under an appropriate heading.)

PAUL M. WARBURG.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to submit a resolution, and in this connection I call attention to an editorial which was submitted this morning by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. I notice in the editorial from the New York World a paragraph quoted from the New York Sun, as follows:

> The business world feels itself fettered by the general attitude of political hostility to the higher mechanism of business, a hostility of which the President is the principal exponent.

Commenting upon that the New York World article, presented by the Senator from Mississippi, contains this paragraph:

> If the almost incredible financial knavery that has been brought to light in connection with the Rock Island represents "the higher mechanism of business" we have no doubt that the President is hostile to it.

That being, Mr. President, upon a very vital and pressing issue now before the Senate and the country, I offer the following resolution relating to the subject.

The resolution (S. Res. 413) was read, as follows:

> Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to report to the Senate the form, manner, and extent of the participation by Paul M. Warburg, recently nominated by the President for membership on the Federal Reserve Board, with the financial transaction or transfers or sales of stocks or bonds of the Rock Island, Chicago & Alton, and other railway companies or systems.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over, under the rule, and be printed.

BOARD OF CHILDREN'S GUARDIANS.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 416), which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to investigate the statement of Prof. William H. H. Hart, principal of the Hart Farm School, and accompanying papers, relating to care and maintenance of wards of the board of children's guardians of the District of Columbia and to damages sustained by him in connection therewith, and to report their findings and recommendations at the next session.

CONVEYANCES IN NEVADA BY CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WALSH. On Thursday evening in the absence of myself and the Senators from Nevada the Senate passed the bill (S. 5042) legalizing certain conveyances heretofore made by the Central Pacific Railroad Co. and others within the State of Nevada. It was intended to submit an amendment to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary before action was taken by the Senate. Accordingly I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed be reconsidered, and that the bill be recalled from the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The usual parliamentary practice will be to recall the bill from the House and enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana to recall the bill from the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Notice will be made of the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be entered.

CONSTRUCTION OF LOCKS AND DAMS.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] will yield, I desire unanimous consent to introduce a resolution seeking information, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not consent that the unfinished business shall be laid aside except for the offering of bills.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think it will lead to any discussion. If it does, I will ask that it go over.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that he will withdraw it if it leads to discussion?

Mr. BURTON. I will ask that it go over if it leads to discussion.

The resolution (S. Res. 414) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested and directed to transmit to the Senate at an early date a list of locks and dams constructed and operated by the Federal Government, with the respective rivers or channels in which they are located, including the cost of construction of each, the cost of maintenance to date, the cost of maintenance for the last year for which figures are available, the distance of each from the mouth or source of the river, the date when each lock and dam was finished and made available for use, and the tonnage passing through each lock for the last year for which statistics are available; also a list of locks and dams now under construction.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to introduce a resolution, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 415) was read, as follows:

Whereas the publication of certain correspondence has been made the basis of allegations in many newspapers that certain persons owing allegiance to and domiciled in the United States have been engaged in correspondence with the authorities of the so-called Constitutionalist Government of Mexico for the purpose of thwarting the designs of the United States Government, and for the promotion of their own interests; and

Whereas in certain of this correspondence agents of the President of the United States have been represented as affording advice to the agents of the said rebellion against the Government of Mexico, intended to enable said revolutionists to evade the orders of the President of the United States against the shipment of arms and munitions of war into Mexico: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed to inquire, investigate, ascertain, and report whether any person, associations, or corporations domiciled in or owing allegiance to the United States have heretofore been or are now engaged in correspondence with those in rebellion against the Government of Mexico and in violation of the laws of the United States, or whether any persons, associations, or corporations have heretofore been or are now engaged in financing, encouraging, or inciting civil strife in Mexico for the promotion of their own interests or for any other reasons, and whether any agents of the President of the United States have been heretofore or are now engaged in giving advice to those in rebellion against the Government of Mexico to enable or lead such agents or authorities to constructively evade the orders of the President of the United States against the shipment of arms or munitions of war into Mexico, or whether any agents of the Government of the United States may be in any way personally or financially interested for their own gain or profit in the regrettable strife in Mexico.

Resolved further, That said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby empowered to summon witnesses, to send for persons or papers, to administer oaths, and to take and secure whatever testimony and evidence that may be required to ascertain and report upon the matters aforesaid; and said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized for the purpose aforesaid to sit wherever necessary and act as well when Congress is not in session as when in session.

Resolved further, That the said committee is hereby directed to report the result of said investigation and inquiry to the Senate during the first month of the next session of Congress; and the expenses incurred by such investigation and inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I note that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has come in, but I think at this time I will not press the resolution. I ask that it may go over under the rule until to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; that is all right. It will go over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over and be printed.

THE COLORADO STRIKE.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD an article in the current number of the North American Review by the governor of Colorado on the Colorado strike. It consists of only 10 pages and is a matter of almost national importance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does the Senator ask to have done with the article?

Mr. THOMAS. That it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COLORADO STRIKE.

[By His Excellency Elias M. Ammons, governor of Colorado.]

Much has been said and much written about the troubles in Colorado arising from the strike of the coal miners. The parties involved have hurled statements back and forth, and contradictions and denunciations more or less intemperate have found their way into the public prints to such an extent that, despite the importance of the subject, the public seems to have no clear conception of what has happened. So far as I know, the State itself has not spoken, nor has anyone in authority as yet properly analyzed the conditions in Colorado. It is therefore my purpose to give here an impartial portrayal of the conditions as they have existed in the past and now exist, and which at present are so generally misrepresented and misunderstood.

For four years an industrial struggle, which only recently reached its most acute development, has been going on in Colorado. The economic problem, serious enough in its beginning, has reached a tragic climax of nation-wide importance. During these four years much bitterness has been engendered, and the dispute, which originally involved an economic question between capital and labor, has finally become political, between the State, on the one hand, and those who deny its authority, on the other. Riot has assumed the proportion of rebellion, focusing the attention of the whole American people upon Colorado.

The origin of the present situation dates back as far as 1910, when the coal miners in the district north of Denver struck. That strike has been going on ever since and remains unsettled at this writing. Largely as a sympathetic measure, a strike was called in the southern coal fields, in which are located the largest and most important mines of the State. This strike was declared in September, 1913, and spread to the mines located in Fremont and Routt Counties. For years the United Mine Workers of America, a powerful international organization of labor numbering over 400,000 members, has been busy organizing local unions among the coal-mining population through which this strike spread. It should be remembered that the coal-mining population of Colorado is composed very largely of south European immigrants who speak practically no English and have as yet little understanding of the American form of government. The mines in which they work are variously owned, there being some 30 or 40 companies operating in the State, of which 3 are conspicuous because of their size and importance. However, although the ownership of all these mines was in various hands when the organization of the miners by the United Mine Workers had progressed sufficiently to make possible the calling of the strike, 20 or 30 small coal-mining companies made common cause with the 3 larger ones and presented a united front of coal-mine owners in opposition to the striking union miners.

These are the contending parties. In this conflict, under present laws, the State government has no voice or concern. It is primarily occupied only with maintaining the peace and dignity of the State. The governor is charged by the constitution with the duty of seeing that the peace of the State is maintained and that its constitution and laws are obeyed by all alike. It is no part of his duty to intervene or mediate in labor strikes or to attempt a settlement of such disputes. I departed from the strict letter of official duty so far as to attempt by every means in my power an adjustment of the dispute between these contending economic forces. I am still engaged in that attempt.

The mine owners in Colorado also own the dwellings erected near the mines for the housing of the workmen and their families. When the strike in the southern field was declared, large numbers of workmen left their former abodes. The United Mine Workers assembled these people in tents near the properties where they had been employed. These groups of striking miners with their families thus assembled in tent colonies were located at points that commanded the approaches to the mines. Colorado has a drastic law against picketing. It prohibits even the persuasion of men at work to quit their employment. The tent colonies were, of course, silent pickets. The nonunion workmen had to pass by or through the colonies in going to work. On the other hand, the mine owners employed a force of guards upon their properties who were armed to protect them and their workmen from aggression. It was not long before the strikers of the colonies were also armed. There were two contending armed bodies in near proximity to each other. The strikers claimed a fear of attack by the mine guards, upon which their leaders justified their armament. So far as I have been able to discover, that fear was unfounded, though it may have been honestly entertained. Between these two armed bodies many bloody battles were fought. To this day the village of Hastings, which harbored then, as now, the families of many hundred workers, exhibits the marks of thousands of bullets shot by a large party of attacking strikers. An automobile containing five of these mine guards, returning to their mine upon their lawful occasion, was ambushed and four of the party murdered, the fifth being seriously wounded and left for dead. With reference to this incident, and to give an insight into the point of view of the striker leaders, I may add that one of the great labor leaders of the country came to my house in Denver and tried to convince me that the men who ambushed and murdered these people ought not to be prosecuted, for the reason that a state of war existed, and that the right of the strikers to kill the mine guards should not be questioned. I could multiply such instances of lawlessness and disorder occurring before the coming of the troops. During all that time I was doing my utmost to forestall further bloodshed and disorder by attempting to settle the strike itself. But the time came when, despite all other considerations, the State had to assert its authority through its military arm. In the southern field a reign of terror prevailed. The good citizens of the State, in no wise concerned with the strike itself, were in real danger of their lives. Between the two contending forces no respect whatever was paid to the constituted civil officers of the peace. Because of the almost frantic appeal of the sheriffs of both southern counties, of the boards of county commissioners, mayors, judges, and other civil authorities, as well as from hundreds of the citizens, I felt constrained to call out the National Guard. These soldiers of the State went into this seething caldron of blood and battle in the last days of October. They found these two armed bodies of men in large numbers thirsting for each other's blood and ready to spring at each other's throats. The National Guard occupied a territory over 100 miles in extent, quelled the disorder, reestablished the constitution, and without firing a shot preserved the peace of the State for six long and weary months.

I feel that I should add here a word for the National Guard. These men have been made the object of very bitter public attack. Opprobrium, undeserved, has been publicly heaped upon them. The charge that they were recruited from the purlieus of the great cities and were not representative of the average population of the State is an absurdity. Any charge that they were hirelings of either side to the industrial dispute is ridiculous. The truth is that the Colorado National Guard is composed, as in other States, of farmers, tradesmen, mechanics, and artisans, with an unusually large proportion of professional men. It is a volunteer force. These men have served their State with a truly commendable devotion, to the sacrifice of their own personal interests, risking their lives in a quarrel not of their making and in which they had no interest. They have not been paid this year even the pittance that is allowed by law. If ever patriotism found expression, it is in the unrecompensed and unselfish services of these soldiers of the State who have only the consciousness of a duty performed to reward them, and upon whom has been heaped the opprobrium and abuse that private interest has dictated.

The troops of the State were able to enforce peace. But it was a sullen and unwilling peace. The mine guards were disarmed and sent away. The strikers promised to surrender their arms, but they did not do so. Similarly, a recent promise of the leaders to surrender these arms to the United States troops was unfulfilled. In the meantime and after the military occupation had begun, I continued unceasingly my efforts to adjust or settle the strike. Conferences with both sides aroused my hopes of a settlement. For 30 days after the calling of the troops I prevented the importation of new workmen and held the situation in abeyance, hoping thus to bring about a termination of the strike, which I felt would be more difficult after the strikers' places in the mines had been taken by other workmen.

About this time, and by the courtesy of the President of the United States, I had the assistance of the Secretary of Labor, himself a member of the United Mine Workers of America. The striking miners had formulated a series of enumerated demands, most of which were vouchsafed by the existing laws of the State of Colorado. The chief, and, as the event has proved, the only remaining point of controversy was the recognition of the union. This point has been insistently refused by the operators and as insistently demanded by the union. Both sides, however, agreed to a conference composed of officials of the mining companies and representatives of the miners, together with the Secretary of Labor and myself. This conference was held in my office. At the request of both sides I acted as chairman of their meetings. The demands of the strikers were considered and discussed. The Secretary of Labor and myself had been led to believe that the point of the recognition of the union was to be waived. At this conference it was agreed that I should make suggestions of settlement which were to be acceded to.

I was much elated at this apparent success, and with the assistance of Secretary Wilson I prepared and forwarded to both sides the agreed suggestions. The strikers were to waive the recognition of the union and the mine owners were to concede every other point demanded. Within a few hours I received a letter from the mine owners unqualifiedly accepting the terms of the proposed settlement. The striking miners, however, rejected the proposal. The conference came to nothing, and the Secretary of Labor returned to Washington. I was afterwards told, confidentially, by the strike members of the conference that they had been instructed in the first place not to accept anything but the recognition of the union.

Upon this miscarriage of our plans of settlement, I directed that all men who desired to work in the mines and who had full knowledge of the strike and conditions of employment should be permitted to work and be protected in so doing. A large number of men were then brought in to work in the mines. They were given military protection in going to the properties and in remaining at work therein. This is the circumstance which caused the strikers to look upon the National Guard as being in league with their adversaries. They saw their places in the mines taken by others whom they called "scabs." They felt the restraint imposed upon them by the State's troops. They could not prevent the working of the mines by these new laborers either by intimidation or by persuasion. Ignorant, and, I am afraid, disposed to lawlessness, these strikers felt that in protecting the nonunion workmen the National Guard was causing their strike to fail. From restlessness their feeling toward the State's troops grew into impatience, and, as days went by, to fury. In this feeling their leaders shared. The fight began to be waged not merely against the coal operators but against the troops and the State itself. Day by day the notion that an unholy alliance existed between the State authorities and the coal-mine owners was disseminated throughout the State and country by the efficient press bureau of the labor organization. Every argument was used to substantiate that idea. Its utter lack of foundation will go without saying. An incident occurring during the military occupation will illustrate the point. When trouble broke out in Routt County, a district remote from the seat of the main trouble, the citizens arose en masse and announced their intention of forcibly expelling the strike leaders from the county. An appeal was made to me for protection against this body of citizens by the strikers' organization. It was promptly met. I sent troops at once into Routt County, protecting the strikers and their leaders from the aggressions of the populace. I had to give military protection to a newspaper in Trinidad, the organ of the strikers, to save the plant from a feared demolition at the hands of the citizens, who felt themselves outraged by its utterances. These and many more such incidents occurred at a time when the strikers' leaders and the strikers' press were proclaiming that the military arm was being used solely in aid of their antagonists.

In the middle of April, after the troops had enforced a six months' peace and when they were almost four months in arrears of pay, it was felt that they must be withdrawn. It was hoped that the peace thus established would continue. It was feared that it would not. The most earnest protests were made to me by citizens of all classes against the withdrawal. It was felt and generally predicted that as soon as the military restraint was removed the stored-up wrath of this alien population would flare out in some malignant way. Within six days after this withdrawal the eruption came. It was general throughout the coal-mining regions of the State. A widely extended uprising had been carefully planned. The storm broke at Ludlow. Much has been made of Ludlow. It was seized upon as a means of inflaming the minds of men and justifying the acts of treason and murder that followed. The facts in connection with Ludlow have been distorted, and in various forms spread broadcast throughout the land. It has been described as a massacre. It is given out that the National Guard, servile hirelings of the great coal companies, mercilessly shot and burned defenseless women and children in the Ludlow tent colony. On the miserable untruth and injustice of such a story I shall comment presently. However, it was believed, and may still find credence among a great number of the American people who have not the facts and have no reason to believe otherwise. Riot became rebellion. Under the blinding glare of the story of Ludlow, as given to the world, the leaders correlated and organized the outbreaks which were smoldering and ready to burst forth into a determined, well-administered, and financed rebellion against the constituted authorities of the State. Ludlow was an incident, not an event. The battles and crimes that were committed during the following 10 days would doubtless have occurred had there been no Ludlow incident.

When the troops were withdrawn, 34 men were left upon police duty near Ludlow, the largest of the tent colonies. On April 20 these men were attacked by ten times their number of strikers. The objective was doubtless the villages 2 or 3 miles distant containing the nonunion workmen and their families. The National Guard thus attacked defended themselves, and later put the strikers to flight and destroyed their colony. The women and children were all removed to places of safety before the attack save only those who were concealed in pits dug beneath the tents. From these pits the soldiers rescued over 30 women and children while the tents were burning. This rescue was made with distinguished bravery and under a heavy fire from the strikers themselves. One pit, almost hermetically sealed, escaped the notice of the rescuers, and 36 hours later was discovered and found to contain the bodies of 2 women and 11 children. These poor people died of suffocation in their subterranean prison, where they had been confined by their would-be protectors. Not a burn or a char or a bullet mark was found upon any of them. The oxygen contained in this closed chamber could not have supported their lives for more than two or three hours. One little boy was accidentally shot, apparently by a striker's bullet. With that exception no women or children were shot or burned or otherwise hurt during the day's fighting. There was no massacre. Men died on both sides; those of the strikers died with arms in their hands fighting against the State; the soldier, on the contrary, tortured and mutilated even before death, gave his life to his country in the discharge of his duty.

Two days later the labor leaders formulated a call to arms, which was published in the press and sent broadcast throughout the State. It was subscribed with the signatures of the leaders. I quote from this call, as follows:

"Organize the men in your community in companies of volunteers to protect the people of Colorado against the murder and cremation of men, women, and children by armed assassins employed by the coal corporations, serving under the guise of State militiamen.

"Gather together for defensive purposes all arms and ammunition legally available. Send name of leader of your company and actual number of men enlisted at once by wire, phone, or mail to W. T. Hickey, secretary of State Federation of Labor.

"Hold all companies subject to order.

"People having arms to spare for these defensive measures are requested to give them to local companies, and where no company exists send them to the State Federation of Labor.

"The State is furnishing us no protection, and we must protect ourselves, our wives, and children from these murderous assassins. We seek no quarrel with the State and we expect to break no law. We intend to exercise our lawful right as citizens, to defend our homes and our constitutional rights."

This call was responded to. The arms that the National Guard failed to gather up were taken from their hiding places and distributed among the strikers. Many more were purchased and placed in the hands of the strikers. During the winter the strikers had augmented their numbers by hundreds, if not thousands, of idle men who never had been coal miners. Colorado seemed to be a resting place for bands of the unemployed. By this augmentation of numbers the force of men who could be armed against the State was truly formidable.

The National Guard was again called out and sent into the southern fields. Its going was heralded by telegrams warning these armed men of the approach of the troop train, and urging that its entrance be disputed. One leader who signed the call to arms was arrested while taking a large number of high-power rifles and quantities of ammunition to his people by automobile. In the northern field armed strikers imprisoned the sheriff in the Hecla mine and besieged him there until relieved by the National Guard. An armed band seized the Chandler mine, in Fremont County, not without much fighting. By way of reprisal the refugees of Ludlow marched 12 miles from Trinidad to Forbes, destroyed that camp, killed 9 of its defenders, and then returned to Trinidad and paraded the streets in triumph. Many of the smaller mines of the State were seized and their managers imprisoned or expelled. The mining villages I have referred to were attacked and many killed. The toll of death in these few days is known to have reached 50, and I believe it to be much greater. The National Guard had to be divided and subdivided, hastening from county to county and occupying fields remote from one another. For nearly 48 hours a pitched battle was fought at Walsenburg with 1,500 armed men who responded to the labor leaders' call for volunteers.

During these red days my chief concern was to prevent further bloodshed. I went into conference after conference with the leaders of the strike to avert further public calamities and prevent the shedding of innocent blood. I was willing to waive for the time all considerations of treasonable practices I besought the leaders' cooperation with me in restoring order. Truce after truce was arranged between the soldiers of the State and their armed adversaries. These truces were scrupulously kept by the National Guard, but the labor leaders who agreed to them either could not or did not control their own people. The time came when the rebellion assumed such proportions that it could not be met with the greatly reduced force at my disposal, a force unpaid for four months, and to pay whom for any further service there was no visible means or prospect of means. I called the legislature of the State together in extra session to provide for this expense. At the same time I requested the President of the United States to take charge of the situation with Federal troops. That request was honored. Upon the coming of the Federal troops, the National Guard was withdrawn from county after county. The name and power of the United States was freely invoked; the strikers and their sympathizers subsided, and peace and order were restored.

So long, at least, as the United States troops remain in Colorado, or when I or some more potent agent shall have succeeded in settling the strike, which, of course, is the root of the evil, peace and order will prevail. If the strike is not settled, or if it shall be deemed necessary to withdraw the United States troops under present conditions, I greatly fear that the struggle will be revived. The strike leaders are very earnest and zealous men in their cause. I fear that their zeal in the hour of passion has led them beyond all lawful bounds.

It is idle to make predictions. Neither side of the industrial conflict is at present disposed to make any concession whatever. Both cry loudly that there is nothing to arbitrate. The recognition of the union remains the vital point of the controversy. The strikers declare that without it all else is in vain. The mine owners point to the fact that they have promised permanent employment to the men now at work in their mines, and that they can not and will not supplant them with those who have been lately engaged in destroying their property and killing their people. They claim that recognition of the union means nothing else.

The State has taken no side whatever in this industrial conflict. I have used every means at my disposal to bring about a settlement and to avert civil war. A time came when I found the leaders of one side of this conflict heading an armed rebellion against the State. I can not escape the belief that Colorado's experience is but a local expression of general conditions and, in that aspect, of vast importance to the people at large. The remedy for such conditions lies with the legislative and not with the executive branch of the government. It is a governor's duty to enforce the constitution and laws of his State. The hundreds or thousands of men lately in arms against the military forces of the State are still in Colorado, and so are their arms, hidden away, perhaps to await a future use. What the future holds, who can say?

ELIAS M. AMMONS.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the action of the House of Representatives requesting a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I now desire to refer to the matter properly before the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask what is the regular order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the privileged question, the motion of the Senator from Arizona that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

Mr. TOWNSEND. To that matter I desire very briefly to speak because of what has been said by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. I have no question as to the Senator's interest in his constituents; I have no question about his loyalty to the people of his State; but I submit, Mr. President, that the Senator has already stated sufficient to disclose the fact that he is not in a position to act as an impartial advocate of the Senate bill. A conference committee so composed would be a vain thing, so far as its influence on the conference for the Senate contention is concerned. I am not quarreling with the Senator as to his views on that matter. He has as good a right to hold those views as I have to hold the contrary; but here is action which has just been taken by the Senate which I regard, and which I must presume that the Senate regarded, as of great importance. It was discussed here for days, and finally it was written into the bill.

The Senator has admitted that he went to the House for the purpose of influencing action on the part of Members of that body against the action of the Senate. I repeat, therefore, that a conference so constituted would not be carrying out the ideas that the Senate has when it creates a conference committee.

I am sorry that the Senator did not feel that it was his duty to refuse to act as a conferee on this bill. It would have cleared the atmosphere; it would have produced in the minds of Senators the idea that there was to be a free, fair, and open conference and that the Senate conferees were to exert themselves to the utmost for the Senate contentions. Any other conference, I repeat, is a vain thing.

I have felt for some time, Mr. President, that we were writing provisions in bills in the Senate with the idea that a conference would write them out again. I submit, Mr. President, it is a bad way to legislate; that to spend time here to write provisions into bills with the idea that a conference will be appointed which would eliminate them would be an almost criminal waste of the Senate's time.

I am, I repeat, sorry that the Senator will stand even as a conferee on the bill under these circumstances; and that is not impeaching his honor nor his integrity nor his devotion to his people at all. But the Senate has a right here. That right has been expressed by a majority vote of the Senate, and we should be sure that every effort is made by the representatives of this body to maintain the action of the majority.

I would rather the withdrawal on the part of the Senator from Montana as a conferee would have been voluntary; but if he does not withdraw, there is a way by which it can be prevented. I shall feel it my duty to move, as a substitute, that the Committee on Indian Affairs appoint the conferees so that a majority of the committee shall appoint the conferees to represent the Senate at this conference.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the intimation of the Senator from Michigan that if I do not withdraw I am liable to be turned down has no effect upon me whatever, because I wanted to hear what he said. I had made my statement in regard to this matter, and the Senator immediately claimed the floor again. I thought it was fair and proper to hear what he had to say, and I wanted to hear what he had to say.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will permit me, I am willing to rest this matter entirely upon what the Senator himself has said on this proposition.

Mr. MYERS. So am I, and if the Senator will listen to me in patience a few seconds longer I think that I will not be in his way any longer. I want to make it plain that nothing the Senator has said about the possibility of appealing this matter to the Senate or leaving it to the Committee on Indian Affairs has the least effect upon me, because I was simply waiting to hear what the Senator had to say. I wanted him to say all he had to say on the subject; I wanted to hear him; but almost immediately after he took the floor the second time and long before he made that suggestion I had told the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], that after the statement which had been made and after the charges which had been made I intended to decline to serve even if appointed on the conference. I also told the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] a short time ago.

In this connection, if the Senator will permit me, I want to say a few words further just along that line. I appreciate the Senator's reference to my loyalty to my State and my constituents, but it seems the Senator has some question about my loyalty to the Senate and my duty as a Member of the Senate. The Senator seems to think it would be a vain thing for the interests of the Senate for me to serve on the conference committee. I do not know why he should think so, unless he would think that I would prove truant and false to my duty and throw down the interests of the Senate. As long as we are in this discussion and I have started out to state the facts and to deal frankly in the matter, I will say that I have not solicited being a conferee and I have given it little thought. Had I been made a conferee I had intended to stand for any reasonable length of time and to any reasonable degree for that amendment of the Senate as well as all others. I had intended to leave that amendment practically, were I a conferee, to the other two Senate conferees, who would naturally, I assume, be the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] on the part of the Senate. I intended to have little to say about it, but to leave it, owing to the circumstances, largely to their judgment and to tell them so, and if they saw fit in the end to recede to abide by that action, and if they saw fit to stand for it, to stand with them always. I had intended to take but little part in the action on this amendment, if any at all, in view of the part that I took on the floor of the Senate.

If a State had an interest in the Indian appropriation bill and a Senator who, in the natural course of things, was liable to be made a conferee stood up for the interest of his State, it had never occurred to me that he was liable thereby to disqualify himself, in the opinion of some Senators, to render himself unfit to act as a conferee. If that is the case, then a Senator who is naturally in the line of appointment as a conferee dare not have anything to say really about amendments to or provisions in the Indian appropriation bill, because if a Senator took a determined stand and was defeated by the Senate, especially if it related to something of interest to his own State, he would thereby be disqualified from acting as a conferee or subject his action as a conferee to the suspicion of other Senators. If that is the case, then about the only thing a Senator can do who is naturally in line to be a conferee and whose State has interest in the Indian appropriation bill is to take no part in the debate over those particular items or else announce that he will not serve as a conferee. It did not occur to me that a Senator would be considered as being put in that position.

However much patriotism Senators may have, or not, I say that I had intended, in view of the part I had taken on this particular amendment, if made a conferee, to have little if anything to say about it, being willing to leave it on the part of the Senate to the judgment and fairness and sense of right and propriety under the circumstances to those whom I would naturally suppose would be my associates on the conference, the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Minnesota.

But I realize now, after the charges which have been made, or the suspicions which have been expressed, that it would not be best for me to go on the conference committee, because, if I went on it and did as I contemplated doing, if I left the matter practically to my associates of the Senate, or even took any other course, or even had joined them in standing up for and insisting on the amendment, and by any perchance the report of the committee should have eliminated that amendment, then Senators who are inclined to believe that I am unfit or disqualified to serve as a conferee would be sufficiently inclined to believe that that particular amendment had been receded from through my stand or influence or activity.

Under the circumstances, even disregarding the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, because I arrived at my conclusion before he threw out his suggestion, I would not want to be a conferee on the part of the Senate; and if unanimously elected or if appointed by the Chair, I would not serve. If, because I have been interested in the affairs of my State and have talked to Representatives from my State about our mutual affairs, as I believed I had a perfect right to do, there are any Senators now who feel that, owing to the circumstances, I am not a fit or qualified conferee to do fair and impartial justice to the Senate, or who have any doubts about my fidelity to my duty to the Senate, they having the preliminary suspicion or doubt now, it would be accentuated if that report should finally eliminate any amendment in regard to Montana in which I took an active part or expressed a decided interest. That being the case, I would prefer not to give any Senator ground for any such suspicion or thought that might arise in his mind. Therefore, under the circumstances, I make the request now that I be not appointed one of the conferees on this bill.

An appropriation bill contains innumerable items and amendments. As I say, it never before occurred to me that a Senator, by taking an interest in such items as pertain particularly to his State, would thereby disqualify himself to act as a conferee, but Senators seem to feel that I have been so faithful to my State that I have unwittingly disqualified myself.

If a bill were pending involving scores of items in which his State might be interested and on which he would be in line to act as a conferee, I fail to see what a Senator would do in the future except to sit quietly or announce in the beginning that under no circumstances would he serve as a conferee. Therefore, I simply ask permission of the Senator from Michigan at this juncture to announce, as I did some time earlier in the discussion, a determination in my mind that I would decline to act as a conferee, but I preferred to hear all that was going to be stated about the matter on either side before announcing my intention. It is a new idea to me, but I wanted to hear what was going to be said before I announced my determination, that I now do announce, and I request the Chair that I may not be designated for service as a conferee on the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, knowing the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] so well as I do, he has come to the conclusion that I expected he would reach. I ought to say, however, that there has been no criticism as militating against his qualifications to sit as a conferee, because his interest in the Indian bill, either for or against certain items, alone, of course, would not disqualify him for a conferee, although it has been true in the Senate during all the time that the ranking members of the committees have not been appointed conferees, but those who were known to favor the measure that was before the Senate have been put upon such committees.

Furthermore, the Senate has the right to expect of its conferees more than passive support of its measures. Members of a conference committee can not sit quietly by and leave the duty of defending the action of the Senate to some others, but every conferee ought to be in a position to work earnestly and conscientiously for the action that has been taken by the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say just one word, because I think this is in effect a challenge of the good faith of a Senator. If we are to indulge in the doctrine that a man is unfitted for the position of conferee because upon one item of a bill containing hundreds of items he had an opinion which was not in accord with the majority of the Senate, it would not be long, if we enforced that sort of rule, until we would find all of the members of the committee likely to be disqualified. That is particularly true with reference to appropriation bills.

Knowing the high character of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and having heard what he said here this morning as to his purpose, and, indeed, without having waited to hear what he said, I have not the slightest doubt that if he were made a conferee he would endeavor to carry out the mandate of the Senate with as great zeal and intelligence as he would if he had voted in a different manner. I confess I do not like what is in effect a challenge of the good faith and integrity of a Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is frank to confess that he was not able to clearly hear the statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] as to whether or not he desired to be appointed on the conference committee on this bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have declined in advance to serve as a member of the conference, but I wish to say, further, what I intended to say while on the floor.

I am not aware, during my more than three years' service here, of any act of impropriety or of bad faith which I have ever committed as a Member of this body, but I do say that under the circumstances I did decline, and now decline, to act as a conferee on the part of the Senate on this bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] declining to serve as a conferee, all I can do is to suggest to the Chair to appoint the next ranking member of the committee in his stead, Mr. PITTMAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is the next ranking member of the committee, but that he is out of the city and will not return until Thursday next. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I move that the trade commission bill be now taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	Myers	Smith, Md.
Brady	Johnson	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones	O'Gorman	Stone
Bryan	Kenyon	Page	Swanson

Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is necessarily absent. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I inquire whether there is any Senator who wishes to address the Senate upon the trade commission bill now pending? If not, I ask to proceed with the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I inquire what is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 5 by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect nor be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts, nor shall anything contained in this act be construed to alter, modify, or repeal the said antitrust acts or any part or parts thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask if it is intended to have a vote at this time?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to know what we were going to vote on, if there was to be a vote, and therefore I asked what the pending amendment was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment, as the Chair understands. For what purpose does the Senator from Missouri rise?

Mr. REED. I rise to suggest that there is only about one-tenth of a quorum in the Senate. Before we proceed to vote upon this bill there will have to be a quorum here. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Burton	Gallinger	Hughes

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and his pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is interrupting the roll call. The Chair has just directed the Secretary to call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary proceeded to call the names of absent Senators, and Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. WALSH answered to their names.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas and Mr. CAMDEN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to repeat, in substance, what I said a few days ago, that the other side of the Chamber is largely responsible for the proposed legislation now pending, and it is a remarkable spectacle that at the hour of 2 o'clock we should spend 15 or 20 minutes in getting a bare quorum of the Senate. Some of us on this side are staying here under great personal inconvenience, and, as we think, to the detriment of our health; and I do not know how long the other side of the Chamber can hold us responsible for being here to make a quorum to consider the so-called administration measures. That is all I care to say, Mr. President, but I think it is well that the country should understand that at the hour of 2 o'clock we have wasted 10 or 15 minutes in getting a bare quorum of the Senate.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. I think it would be fair to absent Senators to say that a number of them are at work in the Committee on the Judiciary perfecting the bills that are to be brought before this body, and a number of others are away on urgent business. I think the absences are mostly unavoidable.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I might add that at the time the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] made his remarks, by actual count there were 10 Republican Senators in this Chamber and there were at least 20 Democratic Senators. While I should like to see a better attendance—I agree to that—I think there is a responsibility upon all Senators to be here when it is at all possible.

Mr. President, at the hour fixed for the recess of the Senate on last Thursday I was in the midst of a discussion of section 5 of the pending bill. I had undertaken to demonstrate two questions: First, that if the term "unfair competition" has a definite meaning that meaning will be incorporated into the statute. Second, that the term "unfair competition" does have a certain limited and definite meaning, and that it does not at all cover those unfair practices which the author of this bill seeks to prohibit. I had stated the proposition that the term "unfair competition" means, in law, those practices by which one man substitutes in the trade his goods for those of another. I had further undertaken to demonstrate, and I think successfully, that the term "unfair competition" has had that particular limited meaning in the law of this country for many years, that it had that particular common-law meaning, and that for many years the courts of England have given to the term that restricted meaning. Therefore I had urged that if we adopt the term into this law all we will have succeeded in doing is to confer upon the commission about to be created a power, under section 5, to prohibit one man from selling his goods as and for the goods of another. Moreover, if we adopt this section as it is now written and confer this power upon the trade commission we will have conferred upon it no power save one which has for many years been exercised by the courts of equity of this country and of England. Besides, we will probably, by the adoption of this section, restrict the right of the citizen to enter the courts and obtain relief until and unless he first applies to the commission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I do, for a question. I desire to proceed and get through with what I have to say, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is all I wanted the Senator to yield for. I shall not detain him more than a second.

The Senator states that if the meaning be attached to "unfair competition" which has been given to it by the court decisions and authorities which he has read, no power or authority will be conferred upon this commission except what has already, and long before this, been exercised by the courts. Does the Senator think we can confer upon this executive or administrative commission authority which has been exercised as a part of the judicial power?

Mr. REED. The Senator has asked a question which I do not want to answer at this time. I think his question a very difficult one. I intend hereafter to discuss that proposition. Just at this time I am addressing myself to the author of this bill and to the friends of this bill, to say to them that if they adopt section 5 in its present terms they will have accomplished nothing except to confer or attempt to confer upon a commission the right to investigate and prevent A from going into the market with goods which are an imitation of the goods of B or which have imitated the trade name of B.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the Senator prefer that I should not ask him any question at this time? I will desist if it interrupts the Senator.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then take the other case: Suppose the Senator is incorrect in his assumption that this bill only attempts to confer what has been heretofore exercised by the courts under the term "unfair competition." Suppose it confers something else. Suppose it confers, or attempts to confer, upon the commission the authority to prohibit a corporation engaged in commerce from doing anything that, in the opinion of the commission, may be unfair. Then what would the Senator say about the validity of the bill?

Mr. REED. I have referred to that in my previous remarks. I said then, and I say now, that if the term "unfair competition" has no definite meaning in the law, and it is written into this bill unaccompanied by language declaring its meaning, we will then be conferring upon the commission the power practically to make the law, to declare that which, in their opinion, is right to be right, and that which, in their opinion, is wrong to be wrong. Thus we will have substituted, for the Government of the people by a law of the land, the rule of the people by the opinion of three or five men.

That, however, is aside from the question I am just now discussing. I want, if I can, to demonstrate to the author of this bill and to its friends, that if they accept section 5 in its present form they will not at all have accomplished the purpose they have in view, which is to prohibit certain practices which may be called unfair, using the term in its colloquial sense, but which, using the term in its legal sense, will not at all be included within that term.

Mr. President, I cited a number of authorities upon this proposition, and I want very briefly to call attention to a few more.

The case of Cole v. American Cement & Oil Co. (130 Fed. Rep., 703), contains this language:

> The law of unfair competition seeks only to restrain fradulent practices inducing confusion of goods and deception of the public, and it can not be used to prevent a defendant from adopting a trade-mark or label intended to attract attention and popularize its produce, although it results, and is intended to result, in better enabling it to compete with complainant, where no deception or confusion of goods is caused or intended thereby.

In that case the defendant issued a circular advertising an article of its manufacture to some extent similar to one issued by the complainant, and inclosed in the cartons containing those goods certain statements, but it was held that this was not unfair competition, where the defendant's circulars did not attempt to impose these goods upon the public as the goods of another.

The case of Howe v. Wyckoff, Seamans & Benedict (198 U. S., l. c., 140), uses this language. I challenge the attention of lawyers to this quotation:

> The essence of the wrong in unfair competition consists in the sale of the goods of one manufacturer or vendor for those of another, and if defendant so conducts its business as not to palm off its goods as those of complainant the action fails.

In Newcomer & Lewis v. Scriven (168 Fed. Rep., 621; l. c., 626), the court said:

> But it is not shown that any customer was misled into buying garments as made or sold by the Scriven Co. which were made by others.

In that case, which was one of unfair competition, the courts dismissed the bill because of the failure to show the deception.

The case of Goodyear India Rubber Glove Manufacturing Co. v. Goodyear Rubber Co. (128 U. S.) is of similar import, the syllabus being:

> Relief in equity to restrain unfair trade is granted only where the defendant, by his marks, signs, labels, or in other ways, represents to the public that the goods sold by him are those manufactured or produced by the plaintiff, thus palming off his goods for those of a different manufacture, to the injury of the public.

In Rathbone v. Champion Steel Range Co. (189 Fed. Rep., 26) I find this as one of the syllabi:

> The essence of the wrong in unfair competition consists in the sale of the goods of one manufacturer or vendor for those of another, and the copying by one manufacturer of stoves of an unpatented design of a stove made by another, only a few of which had been sold, so that it was not known to the buying public, and no purchaser was deceived, the characteristic marks of the original designer being removed and those of the maker substituted, did not constitute unfair competition which would sustain a suit for an injunction.

Now, notice: In that case the defendant had done a very unfair thing. He had copied another man's goods. He was taking advantage of the other man's art and genius and ability. He was, in effect, stealing the other man's ideas; and yet, because the goods of the injured party had never obtained a trade reputation, so that the public would be deceived into believing they were getting his goods instead of those of his unfair and rascally competitor, the court stated this not to be a case of unfair competition, and hence denied the relief.

In Hilker v. Mop Co. (191 Fed. Rep., 613) you will find this language in the syllabi:

> Nothing less than conduct tending to pass off one man's business or merchandise as that of another will constitute unfair competition, and similarity of circulars sent by a defendant manufacturer to its agents and prospective agents to those sent by complainant to its agents is not sufficient to constitute unfair competition, where the contents of the circulars were such that they were not likely to be shown to ultimate purchasers of the article.

Mr. President, I could continue to cite cases of this kind for some hours. The books are full of them. In every case I have been able to discover that has ever been held to be a case of unfair competition the action has been for an imitation of the goods of another, or of the packages in which another incloses his goods, or of the trade name of another, so that a fraud was worked upon the public, the manufacturer or dealer at the same time being deprived of his trade.

Of course, Mr. President, we use the word "unfair" to cover many things. We may use it to describe the competition between firms or individuals. Its colloquial sense is one thing while its legal sense is quite another. When you examine the books you will find that in law the term is universally used to describe the practices specified, referred to a few moments ago. That being true, it follows that if we pass this bill we will have done nothing more than to confer upon this board the right to investigate whether a competitor is imitating the goods or the name of complainant, and it will get us nowhere.

Mr. President, I pause at this time to call attention to the authorities which have been cited by some learned Senators. They have searched through the books to find some place where a court has used the term "unfair competition" in order to describe certain practices which were unjust or rascally. Of course, in all the decisions that have been written it is not difficult to find the term sometimes used in its colloquial sense; but I challenge any man to produce a well-considered decision, especially by any court of the United States, which has held that "unfair competition" has any such meaning as these gentlemen contend for. On the contrary, nearly every case they have cited is, when properly understood, squarely in the teeth of the contention they make.

I know of no better illustration than the case which was referred to by the author of this bill, the learned Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. He read into my remarks on Thursday a quotation from the Supreme Court of the United States which he appeared to think was a conclusive answer to my argument. Now, what was it? He read this language—language which is a part of the court's description of the averments of the petition in this case. I read:

> Without attempting to follow the elaborate averments on these subjects spread over 57 pages of the printed record, it suffices to say that such averments may properly be grouped under the following heads: Rebates, preferences, and other discriminatory practices in favor of the combination by railroad companies; restraint and monopolization by control of pipe lines and unfair practices against competing pipe lines; contracts with competitors in restraint of trade; unfair methods of competition, such as local price cutting at the points where necessary to suppress competition; espionage of the business of competitors; the operation of bogus independent companies; and payments of rebates on oil, with the like intent—

And there the distinguished Senator paused. He should have read on, for what follows not only relates to the same subject, but is part of the same sentence—

the division of the United States into districts, and the limiting of the operation of the various subsidiary corporations to such districts, so that competition in the sale of petroleum products between such corporations had been entirely eliminated and destroyed.

The gravamen of the charge was that the defendant had violated sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman antitrust act, and this language of the court was simply descriptive of the various acts which had been indulged in, all of them having the effect and tending to the creation of a monopoly and to the restraint of trade.

I have gone through this very long opinion. From first to last it is apparent that the action was not one for unfair competition. It was a suit invoking the powers of the Federal Government under the Sherman antitrust act, and the thing that was being tried was whether the Standard Oil Co., by the various practices it had indulged in in seeking to destroy its competitors, in seeking to drive them out of business, in gathering them into its vast organization, had been guilty of a restraint of trade and the creation of a monopoly. Now, when learned and industrious gentlemen are driven to a point where they must grasp at a mere descriptive phrase used by a court, not in its decision, but in loosely describing the practices of the defendant, it seems to me they have but little to stand upon, particularly when the long line of decisions, giving to "unfair competition" a specific and distinct meaning, stands before them and will undoubtedly be followed by the courts.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me the reference of the court to that subject matter was simply a reference to a part of the evidence that went to establish the existence of a trust. All those things can be taken into consideration in an action under the antitrust law for the purpose of showing that the corporation is working in restraint of trade, or is a monopoly. As an evidence of that fact the fact that they drive competitors out of business is among the very best evidence that is considered. That was all that the court intended in the case the Senator cited—to refer to it as a part of the evidence that went to establish the fact that the Standard Oil Co. was a monopoly and was an institution in restraint of trade.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator. I tried to say substantially the same thing; but, I think, with his usual directness and clearness of statement, the Senator from Minnesota has expressed the thought much better than I was able to. Undoubtedly the court went no further than the Senator has indicated.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad the Senator from Missouri is going into this matter so thoroughly, for of course we both have the same purpose in view, and that is to bring certain practices known in the ordinary vernacular as "unfair competition" under the condemnation of this commission.

The Senator is undoubtedly right in his assumption that at common law, as shown by the numerous cases to which he referred, "unfair competition" had a limited signification. Whilst admitting that, I contend that in both economics and law that term has become an elastic term, embracing other things than those originally contemplated in it; and as an evidence of that, those who believe that this phrase is entirely adequate have referred not only to the economic discussions of this matter, showing that the words "unfair competition" have the wide significance that we contend for—a significance which has been reached after years of discussion of trusts and monopolies—but the courts themselves have now accepted the term used by the economists, and are using this phrase, not in the narrow and limited significance which it once had, but in the broader significance which the economists have attached to it.

It is with reference to this that I referred to the language used by Chief Justice White in the Standard Oil case and to the fact that such language has also been used in some of the decrees of the courts; I can not be very exact in my memory of the language employed, but which referred to fair competition as if it were a term of wide significance, and to unfair competition as a term of equally wide significance.

Now, I would be very glad to welcome any suggestion of phraseology that will cover all that we want. My belief is that this phrase will cover everything that we want, and will have such an elastic character that it will meet every new condition and every new practice that may be invented with a view to gradually bringing about monopoly through unfair competition. But if an adequate phrase can be invented or coined that will meet exactly all the requirements of the future, I would be very glad to accept it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is saying over again what has been said here by the Senator before, and he is always interesting, no matter how often he may say the same thing. But the trouble is that when a legislative body, in adopting a statute, employs a phrase which has a definite meaning in law the courts hold that the phrase in the statute has the same meaning it previously had in law. They do not examine to ascertain whether some economist has used it otherwise; they do not examine to find out whether the term has been differently used in newspapers and in current gossip; they ask themselves the question whether the term has been defined in the law, and they accept the legal definition. That is the difficulty. I am not now contending against this bill, but I am insisting that if we undertake to do a thing we ought to do it, and not in attempting to do a certain thing do something entirely different.

Mr. President, I cited authorities the other day where courts had construed statutes almost directly the opposite of what their language in the ordinary and colloquial sense would import, because before the statute was adopted the phraseology employed by the statute had been given a certain particular and technical construction by the courts, and hence it was held that that construction was incorporated into the statute.

Moreover, Mr. President, if the learned Senator will examine the case he himself has cited and to which I referred—the Standard Oil case—he will find there the doctrine which utterly annihilates the view he has just suggested. In the Standard Oil case, in the long and exhaustive opinion by Mr. Justice White, the court distinctly analyzed the claim that the Sherman Antitrust Act was not broad enough to cover the kinds of restraints of trade which had been indulged in by the Standard Oil Co.; and the argument having been made with great force that there was a limited meaning to be attached to the term "restraint of trade," and that there was also a limited meaning to the term "monopoly," Mr. Justice White accepted the doctrine that we must go back to the decisions of the courts in order to ascertain what the meanings of those terms were. Starting with that in view and tracing the history of the decisions of the courts through a long course of years, he arrived at the conclusion that the terms "monopoly" and "restraint of trade" did not under the decisions of the courts have the restricted and narrow meaning contended for by the attorneys of the Standard Oil Co. On the contrary, he found that under the previous decisions of the courts the terms "monopoly" and "restraint of trade" were broad, sweeping, general terms, sufficient to cover the practices of the defendant company.

Mr. President, in that very opinion there is found a condemnation of the practices that will be indulged in here if we were to adopt this phrase, in disregard of the construction which has been given to it by the courts in the past. I call attention to the conclusion of the court with reference to this matter. It will be found at page 56 of the Two hundred and twenty-first United States:

From the review just made it clearly results that outside of the restrictions resulting from the want of power in an individual to voluntarily and unreasonably restrain his right to carry on his trade or business, and outside of the want of right to restrain the free course of trade by contracts or acts which implied a wrongful purpose, freedom to contract and to abstain from contracting and to exercise every reasonable right incident thereto became the rule in the English law. The scope and effect of this freedom to trade and contract is clearly shown by the decision in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor (1892, A. C., 25). While it is true that the decision of the House of Lords in the case in question was announced shortly after the passage of the antitrust act, it serves reflexly to show the exact state of the law in England at the time the antitrust statute was enacted.

In this country also the acts from which it was deemed there resulted a part, if not all, of the injurious consequences ascribed to monopoly, came to be referred to as a monopoly itself. In other words, here, as had been the case in England, practical common sense caused attention to be concentrated not upon the theoretically correct name to be given to the condition or acts which gave rise to a harmful result, but to the result itself and to the remedying of the evils which it produced. The statement just made is illustrated by an early statute of the Province of Massachusetts—that is, chapter 31 of the laws of 1778–79—by which monopoly and forestalling were expressly treated as one and the same thing.

It is also true that while the principles concerning contracts in restraint of trade—that is, voluntary restraint put by a person on his right to pursue his calling, hence only operating subjectively—came generally to be recognized in accordance with the English rule, it came, moreover, to pass that contracts or acts which it was considered had a monopolistic tendency, especially those which were thought to unduly diminish competition, and hence to enhance prices—in other words, to monopolize—came also in a generic sense to be spoken of and treated as they had been in England, as restricting the due course of trade, and therefore as being in restraint of trade.

In other words, we had come to the English rule, which was older than our rule. I am anxious that the Senator shall get right on this question. I appreciate the fact that in examining all the difficult problems presented by this bill it was natural to have employed a term which in its colloquial sense seemed to cover the case. Yet I appeal to him now not to insist upon doing the utterly useless thing of adopting a statute condemning a certain practice by name and overlooking the fact that the meaning in the law of that term is entirely different from the meaning he is seeking to ascribe to it. I imagine one would be in a very peculiar position——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that this section 5, relating to unfair competition, is an additional section not covered by the bill as passed by the House. So even assuming that his narrow interpretation of the term "unfair competition" is correct, nevertheless the bill will be fuller and more complete in the remedy of monopolistic tendencies than would be the bill without it. I assume, of course, that the Senator has been so busy with his work upon the Judiciary Committee and his work of research regarding this particular phrase that he has not yet been able to get to work the constructive quality of his mind, which we all know he possesses, and I again urge that the Senator present here in some concrete form an amendment which will cover all the unfair practices that he would like to see condemned, and which I would like to see condemned, in addition to that particular unfair practice which he says throughout all the time of the common law has been sanctioned in its application to a particular condition.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me that section 5 of the trade commission bill is only nibbling at one side of the real trust question. I wish in this connection to quote from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Tobacco case. A brief summary here will show in what shape the court put it. I read from the opinion as follows:

> Considering, then, the undisputed facts which we have previously stated, it remains only to determine whether they establish that the acts, contracts, agreements, combinations, etc., which were assailed were of such an unusual and wrongful character as to bring them within the prohibitions of the law—

That is, the antitrust law.

> That they were, in our opinion, so overwhelmingly, results from the undisputed facts that it seems only necessary to refer to the facts as we have stated them to demonstrate the correctness of this conclusion. Indeed, the history of the combination is so replete with the doing of acts which it was the obvious purpose of the statute to forbid, so demonstrative of the existence from the beginning of a purpose to acquire dominion and control of the tobacco trade, not by the mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by methods devised in order to monopolize the trade by driving competitors out of business, which were ruthlessly carried out upon the assumption that to work upon the fears or play upon the cupidity of competitors would make success possible. We say these conclusions are inevitable, not because of the vast amount of property aggregated by the combination, not because alone of the many corporations which the proof shows were united by resort to one device or another. Again, not alone because of the dominion and control over the tobacco trade which actually exists, but because we think the conclusion of wrongful purpose and illegal combination is overwhelmingly established by the following considerations.

Then they cite first (a), which I will not read; and they cite next (b), and this is the language of the court:

> (b) Because, immediately after that combination and the increase of capital which followed, the acts which ensued justify the inference that the intention existed to use the power of the combination as a vantage ground to further monopolize the trade in tobacco by means of trade conflicts designed to injure others, either by driving competitors out of the business or compelling them to become parties to a combination—a purpose whose execution was illustrated by the plug war which ensued and its results, by the snuff war which followed and its results, and by the conflict which immediately followed the entry of the combination in England and the division of the world's business by the two foreign contracts which ensued.

So, Mr. President, quoting from this opinion—and I ask the indulgence of the Senator, I say again that this provision in section 5 of the trade commission bill is simply nibbling at one corner of the parts that go to make up a trust monopoly in restraint of trade. It is one of the features that the court will always take into account and always consider. If you restrain that little matter of unfair competition, as you call it, what then? You still leave the trust intact and you get no substantial remedy; you get only one corner of it. The trust still exists to prey upon the public, and you have only had the experience of calling attention to one feature of what the trust in its manipulations and operations is doing. Now, what good does that do?

I apologize to the Senator for taking up so much of his time.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for the interruption.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, this is one of the most important questions before the Senate. It is one of the important measures which the Executive has announced to the country must positively be enacted before we adjourn. Yet there are less than a dozen Senators in the Chamber listening to the discussion. So I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Jones	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Kenyon	Overman	Sterling
Bryan	Kern	Page	Swanson
Camden	Lane	Perkins	Thomas
Catron	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Thompson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. Under the terms of my pair I feel that I am at liberty to vote on this question, and I vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). While I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], we have agreed this morning that either shall be at liberty to vote on such trivial questions as this. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is detained from the Senate on important business. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. In his absence I refrain from voting.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay." I desire also to add that the Senator from Illinois is absent on account of illness in his family.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CATRON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], but, under my understanding with him, I may vote if necessary to make a quorum.

Chilton	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Weeks
Hitchcock	Newlands	Simmons	West
Hughes	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.	White
Johnson	Overman	Smith, Ga.	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not a quorum, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the roll will have to be called.

Mr. TILLMAN. I vote "nay" to make a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the question of adjournment the Chair is of the opinion that it is not necessary to have a quorum in order that the Senate may adjourn or refuse to adjourn.

Mr. REED. It is necessary to have a quorum to record any vote, Mr. President.

Mr. LEWIS. The announcement which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has just made that he would vote makes a quorum.

Mr. HOLLIS. I also have a right to vote in order to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I inquire if there is still a deficiency to make a quorum?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the announcement be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote now is 6 in the affirmative, 42 in the negative, and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] being present makes a quorum. The Senate refuses to adjourn.

Mr. GALLINGER. If we are to do business without a quorum, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] is absent because of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that no business has been transacted since the call of the roll and that there is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. It is impossible to hear in this part of the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call has just disclosed the presence of a quorum, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has suggested the absence of a quorum. The Chair holds that there is a quorum present. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is recognized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the statement was made a moment ago that recent cases had changed the rule I had been discussing. I challenge any man to bring here the decision of a court holding that "unfair competition" is any other or different than I have defined it from the books. Speaking of recent decisions, I call attention to the case of Simplex Automobile Co. against Kahnweiler et al., One hundred and forty-seventh New York Supplement, which was decided on May 15 of this year. In that case the court adheres to the definition, and states:

> Actual or probable deception on the part of customers by reason of the defendant's practices must appear. Of course, there must be actual competition before there can be any unfair competition. * * * There is no evidence to sustain the finding of fraud or deception of the public or diversion of trade.

The case is in line with those I have previously quoted.

Mr. President, I call the attention of Senators to two decisions in Two hundredth Federal Reporter, which, taken together, make the point I am urging very clear. The first is the case of the Coca-Cola Co. against Gay-Ola Co. In that case the Coca-Cola Co. filed its bill of complaint, alleging unfair competition, and specified a partial imitation of its trade name, the imitation of its bottles, the imitation of its printing, the imitation of the color of its product, and various other imitations. Nevertheless, the court held that the Coca-Cola Co. would have probably failed to make out a case of unfair competition if it had not, in addition to the evidence to which I have adverted, shown an actual purpose on the part of the defendant company to impose its goods upon the public as and for the Coca-Cola product. Under those circumstances, the court, in a very exhaustive opinion, declared that there was in this cause a case of unfair competition established, saying in part:

> The record also requires the conclusion that defendant's business had a substantial basis in this contemplated fraud.

It was therefore held that a case of unfair competition had been made out.

As an absolute demonstration, if one can demonstrate anything by the decisions of courts, that the practices against which the author of this bill seeks to level the anathema of the law are not included in the term "unfair competition," I call attention to a very short case. A preliminary word: The author of this bill seeks to prevent every kind of rascally and unjust conduct by which one competitor breaks down the business of another competitor. That is clearly indicated in everything he has said, and he has been very frank about it. Here is a case covering absolutely the character of practices the author of this bill seeks to denounce. It is the case of the Everett Piano Co. against Maus, and I want to read the facts to the Senate, as they are very brief, in order that I may challenge the attention of the Senate to the significance of the authority:

> This suit was brought for alleged unlawful interference with complainant's sales of pianos. Complainant averred that it had for years manufactured and sold pianos under the trade name of "Everett," and had not only established the name as a trade-mark, but had also in 1905 caused the name to be registered according to the laws of the United States.

In this instance there was a trade-mark, which only makes the case that much more forceful.

> The interference averred is, in substance, that defendant while engaged in buying and selling pianos other than the Everett was advertising and representing to the public and to prospective purchasers of pianos that defendant was able to procure from the factories of complainant new Everett pianos, and to sell them at a price far below their real or market value.

What a rascally piece of business that was. How unjust and unfair it was, using those terms in their ordinary and colloquial sense. I proceed to read from the opinion:

> That to deceive the public and prospective purchasers and to injure, damage, and discredit the reputation and standing of and the demand for Everett pianos, as also to injure complainant's reputation and business, defendant keeps at his place of business an Everett piano, which he has permitted to become and remain in an "untuned and poorly voiced condition, so that the music produced from said piano is greatly inferior in quality and tone to the music of an Everett piano in good condition"; that he represents the condition, quality, and music of all Everett pianos to be similar in such respects to this one, which he also represents "to be a new Everett piano, just recently received from complainant's factory"; and that defendant knows all of such advertisements and representations to be false.

One can hardly imagine practices that would be regarded—I am using the term in its colloquial sense—as more unfair, more unjust, more rascally than that. It was a plain attempt to steal another man's trade and business, but the defendant did not seek to attempt to steal that trade and business by substituting his goods for the goods of the complainant, and because the complainant did not allege such substitution and deception of the public, not as to the character of the Everett piano, but a deception of the public as to the identity of the two pianos, the court held this not to be a case of unfair competition. I read:

> We think that the bill states nothing more than a trade libel, and consequently that it does not state a case for the interposition of a court of equity. Kidd v. Horry (C. C., 28 Fed., 773, per Justice Bradley). The bill in its averments fails in a number of particulars respecting well-known grounds for equitable interference.

Now, listen:

> It does not state a case of unfair competition, because it is not averred that defendant has attempted to palm off any other kind of piano as that of complainant. Edward Hilker Mop Co. v. United States Mop Co. (191 Fed., 613, 618; 112 C. C. A., 170; C. C. A., 6th Cir.), and cases there cited. It does not state a case of infringement of complainant's trade-mark (Saxlehner v. Eisner & Mendelson Co., 179 U. S., 19, 33; 21 Sup. Ct., 7; 45 L. Ed., 60), nor a case of boycott, as abundantly appears in the case relied on in that behalf (Gompers v. Buck Stove & Range Co., 221 U. S., 418, 437; 31 Sup. Ct., 492; 55 L. Ed. 797; 34 L. R. A. (N. S.), 874). It falls far short of stating a case of the class to which Emack v. Kane (C. C.) (34 Fed., 46), belongs, or Commercial Acetylene Co. v. Avery Portable Lighting Co. (C. C.) (152 Fed., 642). See also Acme Acetylene Appliance Co. v. Commercial Acetylene Co. (192 Fed., 321; 112 C. C. A., 573; C. C. A., 6th Cir.). A multiplicity of suits (Boise Artesian Water Co. v. Boise City, 213 U. S., 286; 29 Sup. Ct., 426; 53 L. Ed., 796) is not threatened, or at all probable; nor is any showing made that the wrongs averred can not be redressed in a court of law.

There is a case of most unfair practices, using the term in a colloquial sense, but not a case of unfair practices or unfair competition as that term has been defined by the courts of law. So, I might say all the vast field which is endeavored to be covered by the bill is not covered at all, because the use of the term "unfair competition" excludes the very things the author of the bill hopes to cover by his bill. It follows, therefore, if I am correct, that if we adopt section 5, we will simply have conferred upon a commission a power already possessed by courts of equity and which has been exercised for a hundred years, namely, the power to prevent A from imposing his goods upon the public as the goods of B, and that we will have gone no further than that.

Moreover, having addressed ourselves in the law to a method of prohibiting a specific act which has theretofore not been incorporated within the denunciation of our statutory law, we will in all probability have cut off the jurisdiction of the courts until, first, the litigant or complainant shall come to this commission. Instead of being able, as he is now and has been for a hundred years at least been able, to go into a court of equity and invoke its powers and prerogatives and place himself under the protection of its arm, he will be denied access to the courts until he has first come to this tribunal. Thus, instead of furthering a plan for the lessening of unfair and unjust practices, instead of furnishing an additional means by which interference with trade may be made the means of establishing monopoly, we will have built a legal barrier in front of the citizen when he undertakes to enforce his rights. That is not the purpose of my friend who introduced this bill, but that is exactly the position we are placed in.

Mr. President, I am appealing to Senators not to put upon the statute books a law that will be abortive. At the present time public opinion is well crystallized back of a movement to further curtail and, if possible, effectually eradicate the powers and privileges of monopoly. It is the experience of all legislative bodies that when a sentiment is so crystallized, if some act can be passed which impresses the public with the thought that a remedy has been effectuated, public opinion lapses and the battle is over for the time being, and it may be years before again public sentiment can be aroused so that legislation is possible. Accordingly, the worst enemy of trust legislation could hope for nothing better than to see this Congress solemnly adopt a law and adjourn, only to discover after adjournment that all it had succeeded in doing was to actually circumscribe and narrow the scope of the antitrust statutes now upon the books.

If Senators who have studied this law will examine the authorities that I have cited, and examine the authorities which have been cited by my friends who take an opposite view, they will discover that the path of the law is very plain; that it leads unerringly to the conclusion that "unfair competition" is limited as I have said it is limited, and as all these books say it is limited, and that what our friends upon the other side are relying upon is the mere loose or argumentative statements, descriptive phraseology that creeps into the opinions of courts, and that was never intended to amount to a declaration by the court that the term "unfair competition" covers the practices these gentlemen seek to prohibit.

Mr. President, there are other important considerations, and I address myself for just a moment to the statement of one of them.

If this term has a definite meaning, and if it be the narrow meaning I contend it must be given, then clearly we can not put it in a statute, because it will do exactly the thing we do not want to do. It will become necessary, therefore, to find some other term, some other phrase, if we proceed to enact section 5 of this bill. In seeking for that term or phrase, I have this to say: Unless some lawyer can discover a term which has been held to embrace the practices we seek to prohibit, and that term has been clearly construed by the courts, so that when we adopt it we adopt it with the construction, then we must, by apt and proper language, define the acts or character of acts we propose to prohibit, because if we do not employ a term which has a definite meaning or do not employ a descriptive phrase which advises all of the people as to what is lawful and what is unlawful we have not succeeded in passing a law at all. The attempted law will be void because of vagueness and uncertainty or else it will be void because we have sought to grant to a board almost unlimited powers. Thus, we will have provided that the people shall be governed not by the law of the land but by the will of a board of men, which is only another way of stating that you will have substituted arbitrary government and arbitrary power for free government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] an amendment which has been agreed to by the committee and which has the approval of the Senator from Iowa. The committee's action consists in dividing this proviso into two parts and placing the latter part as an additional section, to be called section 11.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is as follows:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect nor be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

That was adopted after striking out the words "have any force or effect nor," so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

I offer that as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and later on I shall offer an amendment by way of an additional section to the bill which will cover the closing part of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, does the Senator ask that a vote shall be had upon the amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be stated from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 5 by adding the following:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Nevada as to the accuracy of the suggestion that was made in certain newspapers this morning—and I do not always give credit to the newspapers as being accurate—that the majority side of the Chamber, through their several committees, are now engaged in perfecting certain bills that have been reported to them with a view of consolidating the three bills that we have talked about more or less into one bill for the consideration of the Senate.

I will say to the Senator that that appealed very strongly to me, if it is a feasible thing to do, and it gave me courage to believe that if that course were pursued we would be able to get away from Washington before the fall months were upon us. I simply ask the Senator for information, as I have no doubt he exactly understands the status of the bills that are now being considered by, I think, two committees of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, no suggestion has come to my attention, except that from the newspapers, with reference to joining these three bills in one bill. The Judiciary Committee has been considering the so-called Clayton bill, and, I am told, will be able to report it within a couple of days. The Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate has been considering the so-called railroad securities bill and will be able to report that shortly; but the latter bill has no relation whatever to the subject matter of the trusts, and, of course, it would hardly be proper to attempt to incorporate that bill with the other two. A junction between the other two might be possible, but I see no inclination in that direction, and at present I do not think it desirable.

I will state that the members of the two committees have been in communication with each other, and I understand some amendments are being made in the Judiciary Committee which will make the interstate trade commission the medium of enforcement of certain of the provisions in the Clayton bill to the exclusion of the criminal penalties now imposed by that bill. I will also state, with reference to the question of interlocking directors and holding companies, that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has been pressing certain amendments to this bill, holding that the enforcement of those provisions should be intrusted to the trade commission. There are provisions in the Clayton bill relating to interlocking directors and holding companies, and those provisions are enforced there through penalties; but if that bill is amended in such a way as to intrust the enforcement of those provisions to the interstate trade commission, the same purpose will be accomplished that is sought to be accomplished by the Senator from Iowa. So I think there is every prospect of harmony of action on this question.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, I think, answers my question. I was merely solicitous of ascertaining, leaving out of the calculation the bill regulating the issuance of bonds and securities, whether there was any probability or purpose of consolidating the so-called Clayton bill with this bill in some form and making it one bill covering substantially the ground that the two bills now occupy. It occurred to me that if that could be done it would lessen the debate.

If we are to have three separate bills before the Senate in this torrid season of the year for lengthy consideration and debate, I suppose some of us will live through it—I propose to, for instance, because I am young—but I should be glad, indeed, if there were a short cut toward reaching the same point.

I am not arguing against or for any one of these bills, because I confess I know very little about them at the present time. I expect to be enlightened later on. If the Senator says there is no purpose to accomplish that result and that the statements of the newspapers are without authority, that absolutely answers my question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, lest there should be a misunderstanding, being a member of the Judiciary Committee I think I ought to say that I think it is very doubtful whether the Judiciary Committee will bring in a bill in such form that its enforcement will depend upon the trade commission. It may be done. The truth about the matter is, to my mind at least, that we are proceeding here like sheep without a shepherd. We have divided a question which ought not to have been divided. It is here in the form of two or three bills when it should be here in one bill. There is no question in my mind but that we would gain time if this bill were referred back to the committee from which it was reported, and if the Senate were to pass a resolution requesting the Interstate Commerce Committee and the Judiciary Committee to meet jointly and to jointly consider this bill and the so-called Clayton bill. If that were done we might agree upon a consolidated bill, and we might get somewhere.

As it is now, this bill is being pressed for passage. If it is passed in anything like its present form it will have to do with the enforcement of matters of a general character and nature which are covered by the Clayton bill. At the same time the members of the Judiciary Committee are working on the Clayton bill and they can not assume that this bill will be passed; neither do they know what its form will be if it is passed. They are utterly in the dark as to whether this bill will go through with a board possessed of broad and general powers or whether it will be a board of limited jurisdiction and powers, or, indeed, whether there will be a board.

Therefore we are required to pass upon a substantive law and to provide the machinery for its enforcement, while the very machinery that might have to do with its enforcement is being created here in the Senate.

So long as we are proceeding in this way I do not think we are going to get anywhere. I am greatly interested in this bill. I want to be here when it is discussed. I want to know what the Senate is going to do about it, and I want to know what the Senate is going to do about this bill before I am ready to conclude that we are prepared to act upon the other bills, because, if this bill is passed, then, of course, the others might be changed in many respects, whereas if this bill is defeated, or if it is greatly modified, then, of course, we must, in considering the measure now before the Judiciary Committee, prepare to go alone.

I am not the chairman of either of these committees; I have no authority to speak for anybody but myself; but it seems to me that what ought to be done is to take an adjournment of about three days, and these two committees ought to be requested to get together; they ought to try to hammer this legislation into shape, and at the end of that time to bring in a consistent general plan.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think there is some misapprehension among Members of the Senate in regard to the three bills which have been alluded to. The Interstate Commerce Committee had two of those bills under consideration. One it has reported, and that is the trade-commission bill. The other bill, which it has under consideration, is the so-called railroad-securities bill. That bill, which has been called the Rayburn bill, has absolutely nothing to do with the functions of the trade commission. The trade commission is not given any power and is not called upon to act with regard to any matter contained in the Rayburn bill. The railroad-securities bill or Rayburn bill deals solely and exclusively with matters pertaining to the issue of railroad securities and increasing the inquisitorial powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission—two subjects which, I think, everyone must grant have absolutely nothing to do with the trade-commission bill. Then why should that bill be brought in with the trade-commission bill? I think I may absolutely disagree with all the propositions in the Rayburn bill, but there is no reason why I should disagree with this bill for that reason, or why I should agree with this bill because I agree with the Rayburn bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Surely.

Mr. REED. I have not intended, in what I have said, to be referring to the Rayburn bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand.

Mr. REED. That is a bill by itself, as the Senator states. I think it could be enacted without any conflict with the other two bills or anything that is contained in their sweep and purview.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And should be, I think, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. But the particular bill we have here now is intimately associated with the bill that is before the Judiciary Committee, called the Clayton bill. Each of them relates to the same general subject, and if a commission is to be created, its powers and its duties ought to be specified with reference to the matter contained in the Clayton bill. If it is not to be created, then in enacting the Clayton bill we must provide the methods for its enforcement. So it seems me that both of these bills belong in the same class and ought to be brought in as one general plan.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, somewhat inadvertantly I alluded to the three bills; but, upon the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada, I immediately excluded the bill with relation to railroad securities, and then simply interrogated the Senator as to the probability of consolidating the so-called Clayton bill and the trade-commission bill. That was the only point I had in mind.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have no doubt that many of the subjects which are being considered in connection with the so-called Clayton bill or the antitrust bill might be considered in connection with the trade-commission bill. It is also true that there are subjects in the Clayton bill as it came from the House and the Senate which have no necessary connection whatever with the trade-commission bill. For example, the matter of the exemption of trade unions and matters of that sort can be treated of in an entirely separate bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And injunctions.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And matters pertaining to injunctions, as the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee suggests.

The Interstate Commerce Committee did, in a quite exhaustive way, consider all the subjects embraced in all three of these bills. When they came from the House, if I recall correctly, it was at the instance of the Judiciary Committee that the Clayton bill was referred to that committee; and it was so referred without objection from the Interstate Commerce Committee, because I am satisfied that if the other members of the committee felt as I did, they were perfectly willing that the Judiciary Committee should wrestle with many of the problems contained in the so-called Clayton bill.

I see no reason, however, why we can not dispose of the trade-commission bill practically as it is reported; and I think it could be very readily done if some of the gentlemen who have addressed themselves to section 5 of this bill would make constructive suggestions regarding the subject aimed at by section 5 rather than simply object because section 5 is not framed in a way which would suit them.

I intended to ask the Senator from Missouri, to whose argument I listened with a great deal of interest, as I always do to his arguments, whether it would not be possible to avoid every objection he has made to the method of drawing section 5 by giving the words "unfair competition" a statutory construction in the act itself? Without undertaking to make any conclusive suggestion, or one which has been very thoroughly considered, but to make a suggestion which I wish he would consider in view of his argument, I would suggest that his argument might be met by including in that section something equivalent to the following:

> The words "unfair competition," as used in this act, shall be construed in their ordinary, usual, and colloquial sense, and shall include anything printed, said, or done in the course of trade, or in aid thereof, which would give to any injured party a right of action at law or in equity.

Thereby including in the jurisdiction of the trade commission the right to inquire in a preliminary way and to use its power to prevent the use by any unfair competitor, speaking in the colloquial sense, of those methods, or to prevent such competitor doing those things which the courts of this country have settled to be improper and illegal.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, as the Senator addresses his request to me, if the courts of this country have already settled that the acts to be referred to are improper and illegal, then the last thing we ought to do is to deprive those courts of jurisdiction and deprive the citizen of his opportunity to go into the courts and protect his rights. Moreover, the definition advanced by the Senator seems to me—and I speak now, of course, having simply heard it read once—fails utterly to reach the things we want to reach. We do not care to reach the things the law already condemns and that the courts already prohibit and punish. Our remedy there is complete; yet the definition would limit us to that kind of case. What we want to reach is that realm which at present may be entered upon by the unjust man.

To illustrate—and I take the commonest and plainest illustration—a very large concern like the American Tobacco Co., spread over the entire country with its business, can afford at a given point to run its business at an absolute loss for many years because it is replenishing its exchequer from all the rest of the country. Accordingly such an institution, desiring to destroy a competitor that is weaker than it is, can go into his trade territory and sell goods similar to his for less than the actual cost of production and force him into bankruptcy.

Now, that is to-day absolutely legitimate. Absolutely one competitor has the right to do that to another competitor unless you can go further and show that he is in fact creating a monopoly. It is to that destructive competition we ought to address ourselves as one of the things to be corrected. There are, of course, many other unjust practices we can reach.

But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that we gain nothing by giving this commission control over acts which the courts already have control over and which the law already condemns. Indeed, I would rather open the door of the courts of this land to parties who are injured than create a dozen commissions, for whenever you give every citizen his right to go into court and to protect himself, there are then open thousands of tribunals where justice may be obtained, whereas if you undertake to concentrate all those powers in one board you at least make it more difficult to obtain redress.

We must by general terms or by specific terms prohibit the practices which we believe to be inimical to trade, and we accomplish nothing unless we go beyond the point the law has already reached, for if we do not go beyond the point the law has already reached, of course we remain exactly where we are now, except we have created a new tribunal that has obstructive machinery, because, as this bill is drawn, it would seem to leave the matter in this wise, that an injured party would be first required to go to the commission for his relief instead of going to the court of his own district.

If the Senator will pardon this long interruption, I think we will never harmonize these two bills except by putting them upon the same table before the same committee, where they can be amalgamated. I believe if that were done we might agree upon certain substantive antitrust legislation, and we might agree to create a trade commission having at least broad powers of investigation. But I do not believe we will ever agree upon any law that will place the business of this country under the control of a board governed by no rule of action except its own concept of what is right and what is wrong.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri misapprehends in a large measure the good which may come from this trade-commission bill. I have already said that I am not prepared to follow as far as others may lead in commission government, but I think one affirmative good which this bill may produce will be the easy remedy which may be had by anyone aggrieved, without expense to himself, to have full consideration given to his complaints, just as the Interstate Commerce Commission makes quick and easy investigation and reports when complaints are made to it regarding railroad rates and questions of that character.

It seems to me that this trade commission may very well act in a preliminary fashion in securing the rights of persons engaged in trade where they are being oppressed by the practices of their competitors in a way which financially, because of the great expense of courts and of the time it would require, they can in no other wise meet. It seems to me that will possibly be the greatest benefit which may arise from this trade-commission bill as it is proposed.

But, Mr. President, I can not have much sympathy with the proposal that it is easier and better to do two things than it is to do one thing. The Judiciary Committee has not yet reported on its bill, and no one can tell when it will report. This bill as it now stands has met the general accord of a majority of the Interstate Committee and will work some affirmative good. If the Senate desires that the Judiciary Committee shall report a proper amendment, we can impose any other duties upon this commission which the Congress may see fit to add to it. We may use the trades commission as a hat rack if we desire, and let anything be hung upon it, let any duty be imposed upon it, that Congress may see fit to hang upon it or impose upon it.

It is due to the misapprehension which, I think, the Senator has as to the good which may come from the general inquiry which, in a preliminary way, is made by this trade commission that he is in error. I believe myself that we advance the matter very much more quickly by bringing in this bill, and as most of the Senators who have objected to this bill have addressed themselves to section 5, if they will aid to perfect section 5, I am sure we will shorten the time for the consideration of the bill very greatly.

I hope the Senator from Missouri will aid us in producing, regarding the objects of section 5, the end which his great ability would undoubtedly be very useful in producing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I must not be put in position of one who is seeking to obstruct remedial legislation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator did not understand me as making that suggestion.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am sure I did not.

Mr. REED. No; I am sure the Senator did not mean to say that, yet once or twice this afternoon it has been suggested that I would be better employed if I would write section 5 in a correct way than I am in finding fault with it.

The first thing necessary to get the mind of the Senate concentrated upon the thought of writing a proper section is to convince the Senate that the section as it is now written will not be effective, and it is for that reason that I have been taking the time of the Senate and have tried to convince it that section 5 is ineffective. If the chairman of the committee and the committee that brought in section 5 will withdraw it and bring in a substitute, or if they will say now that they do not propose to urge it, then of course we can start the work of trying to draw a proper section.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only desire to interrupt the Senator for a moment, to call his attention to a fact which I think I ought to have stated before. I have myself proposed an amendment to this section providing that the finding of the commission shall be only prima facie evidence in the courts of the facts therein found and shall in no wise conclude any litigants in the court from attacking the finality of that finding. I thought I ought to call the attention of the Senator to that.

Mr. REED. Of course the amendment suggested by the Senator from Delaware would remove one of the constitutional difficulties that now confronts us, because on that point I am very clear in my mind, although I reserve the right, upon further examination of the authorities, to change my opinion if I find, upon examination of the authorities, that my present view is erroneous. I am very clearly of the opinion that you can not make a finding by a board or commission of this kind conclusive of any question of fact or law.

But, Mr. President, addressing myself just a moment to the suggestion made a moment ago, that we could go on and pass the trade commission bill and that the Judiciary Committee could go ahead with its work, let me show how impossible that is—not by generalization, but by specific statement. Let me take section 12 of the Clayton Act, which provides "that whenever a corporation shall violate any of the provisions of the antitrust laws, such violation shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents."

There are those who contend that before such a drastic remedy as that is invoked there should be a finding by a commission and an opportunity for the officers of the corporation to undo their wrongful acts, and that only in the event they fail to undo those wrongful acts should they be held criminally liable. I am not saying for a moment that I agree to that view, but it is a view that is advanced. Yet those who propose it do not know whether or not we are going to have a commission. If they know we will have a commission, then their argument, of course, will be addressed solely to the question as to the advisability of such a line of procedure as I have indicated they believe in.

I could go through this bill and show the same situation with reference to other sections. I perhaps chose the poorest illustration in the bill when I selected section 12.

Moreover, the Clayton bill not only deals with the labor problem and with the trust problem, but it also, strangely enough, deals with banking problems. There are a number of sections in that bill which ought to be handled as a separate bill, and I break no confidence when I say that the Judiciary Committee has solved that problem by agreeing to strike them out.

But all the trust features of the bill have two elements. First, a denunciation by law of certain acts that have a tendency toward the creation of trusts and monopoly and that are destructive of honest competition as illegal; second, the designation of a tribunal to determine the facts and to enforce the law.

Dealing with those identical subjects is this trade-commission bill. If we strike out section 5 and leave this merely to be a board of investigation, well and good; but with section 5 or anything covering the bill that section 5 is intended to cover remaining in the bill, then you will have this sort of a situation. The Judiciary Committee is dealing with certain practices that are specified, and at the same moment you are creating a commission here and propose to give it such broad powers that its authority extends to every practice and act of concerns engaged in interstate commerce. The jurisdiction of the commission covers the whole field as with a blanket.

Thus there are two plans, each of them separate and distinct, both of them being considered at the same time—one of them being considered in the Senate, the other being considered in the committee. The Senate can not intelligently act until it knows what the committee will report regarding the bill it has, and the committee can not act until it knows what the condition of the law is to be at the time they bring in their report.

The thing to do, in my judgment, is to get both these bills before the same committee or before the joint committees. Let them consider the two together. Let them bring in a report which embraces what is good in both and which will work out one consistent plan and scheme.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Nothing but that will ever give us in my judgment a harmonious scheme of legislation or get us anywhere.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri if it is possible to carry out his idea except by unanimous consent?

Mr. REED. That is a parliamentary question the Chair can answer. I think this bill by resolution of the Senate could be referred to the joint committee; that is, the committee——

Mr. VARDAMAN. It would require an amendment to the rule.

Mr. REED. No; I think not. I think a resolution could settle it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has found out that the Senate can do anything.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was just going to suggest to the Senator from Missouri, in order to bring up the matter in a concrete form, that it might be well, if that is his opinion, to put it in the form of a resolution. It strikes me there is a great deal of merit in the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I think the logical way to act is to have a vote as soon as possible upon this bill and the amendments. If section 5 be stricken out, we will then have, as the Senator from Missouri says, simply a bill which provides for a trade commission with ample powers of investigation upon their own initiative and in aid of the courts and of the Attorney General. If section 5 remains in, then the Judiciary Committee will know to what subjects the Clayton bill should be confined. It can, if it chooses, taking the view that is entertained by the Interstate Commerce Committee, conclude that section 5 covers all the various practices that in the common vernacular are termed "unfair competition," and having come to that conclusion, the Judiciary Committee can, if it chooses, leave out all legislation with reference to specific practices which are to-day regarded as "unfair competition," or they can put them in, according to their pleasure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me if I ask him a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If we create a commission with power to prohibit all unfair practices in trade, then, in the name of goodness, what is the use of passing any more law? Why trouble ourselves further? Why not go home and go to rest and enjoy our sweet repose and say that the business of this country is in the hands of that commission, with full power to prohibit everything that is wrong and to promote everything that is right? That is the very question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, that will be a consideration that will address itself to the mind of every Senator when he votes upon section 5. If he is of the view of the Senator from Missouri, he will vote against it; and if there should be a majority of the votes of the Senate in accordance with this view, section 5 will go out, and we will still have a bill just as good as, and, in my opinion, better, than the bill that comes from the other House; but if the Senate should be of a contrary opinion, and should be desirous of bringing peace to the business of this country, to afford protection to numberless pigmies in business that are now being injured and destroyed by giant competitors, whose practices, whilst leading up to monopoly, do not as yet have the character of monopoly—why, then, if the majority have that view and think that is a desirable end to be attained, section 5 will remain in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if there are a number of small business concerns which are being destroyed by monopolistic practices, the thought occurs to me why somebody is not active in taking hold of those people who are destroying them? We have sufficient law and we have the means at hand by which to take hold of them; and if they are so well known—and I think they are; I think the Senator is right—I do not see why we do not take hold of those people who are practicing monopoly, or who are guilty of monopolistic practices which lead to a complete monopoly, and put them where they belong.

Mr. NELSON. By giving them places of honor. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator from Idaho thinks that the machinery of the law is now adequate to meet every condition, of course he will vote against this bill; but I do not think it is, and the friends of this bill do not think it is. There are numerous practices tending toward monopoly that may not come within the provisions of the antitrust law and amount to a monopoly or to monopolization. We want to check monopoly in the embryo. Monopoly commences in insidious ways, by practices that are against good morals and constitute violations of individual rights for which the individual can have an action at law or in equity, but rights which the individual, because of his poverty or of his insignificance, is often unable to assert against these great organized powers. The very purpose of this bill is to protect small business against giant competitors just as we protected the shippers of the country against the giant railroad combinations when already there were remedies both at law and in equity in favor of the shippers. There never has been a time in the history of the common law when an action would not lie for extortion. The Senator from Idaho would relegate society to its ancient condition, with reference to those giant railroad combinations, so that every man who is oppressed would have to go into court with expensive counsel——

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho would not do that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And assert his right against the gigantic organizations.

Mr. BORAH. The Sherman antitrust law may be enforced by the Government itself at the public expense, and through the public prosecutor, the Attorney General, that law is made effective; that is, if it is made effective. It is not at the expense of the individual, unless the individual sees fit to go into the prosecution. Then if he recovers he gets three times the amount of his damages.

I would not relegate these people to the old condition of affairs, but Chief Justice White, in his opinion in a great case with which we are all familiar, said that this law not only prohibits monopoly, but it prohibits every step which may lead to monopoly. I do not know of a single step which we would prohibit that is not prohibited by the interpretation of the law which has been placed upon it. You not only have the public prosecutor, but you have under this law the means by which an individual may cause the punishment of a person who has injured him. I think when you have the law, but not the courage to enforce it, you can not get any more by enacting more law.

The objection, Mr. President, to this proposition, to my mind, is that we have a few men who ought to be brought under the surveillance of the law and who ought to be punished, and you are building a scheme here which proceeds upon the theory that you want to oversee and to supervise and superintend and police the entire business world, 90 per cent of which does not need it at all. If we could have those who are in charge of these monopolistic combines punished, or if we could have the combines dissolved, if we could have these monopolies broken up, there would be no occasion for this very heavy expense to which we are to be put for the purpose of supervising the honest and those who are carrying on a legitimate business. If we have not the willingness or the courage to enforce the law we have, we will simply have another dead letter on the statute books.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the antitrust law is either inadequate to cover all the conditions that gradually lead up to monopoly, or else the machinery for the administration of that law is and has been so ineffective as not to accomplish its object.

The Senator inquires why we do not get to work in the enforcement of that law. Well, does the Senator expect conditions to be any better in the future than they have been in the past? We have had numerous lawsuits upon this vexed question, and yet the practical results have not been satisfactory to the American people. We have been given the law, yes; but the practical enforcement of the law has not been satisfactory to the American people. Now, does the Senator propose to indict every one of the Presidents and indict every one of the Attorneys General for neglect of duty? Is it not time to think that there is something defective in the system itself which intrusts the enforcement of that law to the shifting incumbency of the Attorney General's Office, with three or four Attorneys General in one administration?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I beg the Senator not to interrupt me at present; I will yield to him in a moment.

The Attorney General's Office is a part of the political department of the Government, subject, as we know, in the past to political influences, so that prosecutions have been accelerated and prosecutions have been slowed down because of the exigencies of the hour. Has there been anything of that kind in the administration of the interstate-commerce law by the Interstate Commerce Commission? No; it has moved on with dignity, precision, consecutiveness, and power, until it has covered the entire field of railroad administration and has declared principles that are known to all, so much so that there is nothing left now in railroad administration except the control of securities and the valuation of the roads themselves. The administration of the interstate-commerce act side by side for the last 20 years with the administration of the antitrust act, one intrusted to a commission and the other intrusted to an officer of the political department of the Government, indicates the superiority of the former system.

Whilst this bill does not go as far as I would wish, it goes very far, and ultimately, with popular approval, it will go far enough, in my judgment, to embrace the entire administration of the antitrust acts.

With reference to section 5, let us have a vote upon it and let it either stay in or go out of the bill. The Judiciary Committee will know then what our action upon that subject is. I am sure I am not averse to consultation with the Judiciary Committee. I welcome such consultation, and will be glad to confer with them at any time upon the provisions of the two bills; but I do not see any reason why the prosecution of this particular legislation should be slowed up for an instant. On the contrary, I believe it will lead to a more logical conclusion with reference to the Clayton bill.

So far as I am concerned, with reference to many of the practices which are proposed to be condemned in the Clayton bill, I think that the provisions against them might be better enforced through the proposed trade commission. I believe in the effective way of giving a man who is violating the law and who happens to be a director of a corporation, or to give the corporation itself, an order to show cause why a certain practice should not be discontinued and have a summary hearing and the decision of this tribunal of experts—not simply experts in law, but experts in industry and trade.

I am solicitous that the rights of those brought before that tribunal shall be so protected as that an appeal to the court can be taken under such sanctions as we prescribe for the preservation of the corporation's rights in the full presentation of its case.

Then there is the power to punish by contempt for disobedience to the mandate of the law, which is much more effective than the criminal prosecution of individuals, bringing them before grand juries and petit juries and submitting all these questions to the varying influences, passions, and prejudices of the hour. I believe that in this way a complete system of administrative law can be built up much more securely than by the eccentric action of grand juries and trial juries. I believe that it is not always necessary to administer the law with the aid of grand and trial juries. The vast body of our law is civil law. The parties have their remedy either in damages or by the summary processes of a court of equity, which can seize hold of a recalcitrant and bring him into subjection to the law, and the administrative tribunal will aid and accelerate the administration of the civil law.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I would be willing to yield to any suggestion for mutual consultation between the Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but I am not willing, so far as my individual view is concerned, to see the passage of this bill delayed. That is a matter, of course, that is subject to the wisdom of the Senate itself.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have listened with astonishment to the remarkable speech of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. One would think, after listening to his remarks, that the sort of Pooh-Bah commission proposed by the pending bill will have greater powers and will be more effective against trusts and combinations in this country than all our courts combined. Most of the leading trusts in this country have been prosecuted in the courts. The Sugar Trust is now in the courts, and testimony is being taken in that suit; the Harvester Trust is in the courts; the Steel Trust is in the courts; the Tobacco and the Standard Oil cases have been decided by the courts, and there are a number of other trust cases pending. Judging from the remarks of the Senator from Nevada, he infers that the proposed trade commission is to constitute a great remedy for the suppression of trusts. The opinion seems to prevail in some quarters that if you give the proposed commission ample power it will do more to suppress trusts and monopolies in this country than all the courts of the country combined; and yet what jurisdiction is given the commission? Its activities are confined simply to one feature of what occurs in the case of a trust or a monopoly. These trusts and monopolies, as a rule, are formed under the corporation laws of the several States. If we had no corporation laws, if men could do business only as individuals or as partnerships, it would be impossible to form these great corporations. They are formed through the corporation laws of the several States; and after these monopolies have been formed and established a part of their work, in many instances, is to drive out competitors from the field, and the few they have not been able to absorb in their combination they seek to drive out by unfair competition.

What does the Senator from Nevada propose to do with his bill? What is the trust remedy he proposes? Why, as I said a moment ago, it is only to nibble at one side of the trust. It is simply to reach the matter of unfair competition. Suppress that, and you have accomplished the whole thing, according to the idea of the Senator from Nevada. You still leave the monopoly; you still leave it in all its force and power, as it has been able to form itself under the corporation laws of the several States. All that you can do, taking all that is claimed for section 5, is that you can suppress unfair competition; but in all other respects the octopus, the monopoly, remains a living being to plague the American people.

I can tell you what section 5 is for. It does not require much to tell what it is for. It is to act as a brake, as a protector, as a back fire for these monopolies against the enforcement of the antitrust law. This is not a new matter, Mr. President. Ever since these big concerns found that there was some virtue in the antitrust law, and found that the courts had power to dissolve these trusts and resort to drastic remedies, the hue and cry went up from them: "Oh, for God's sake, let us know how to do business within the pale of the law. Since these decisions in the Trans-Missouri case and the Joint Traffic case and the Knight case and the Standard Oil case we are at a loss to know how to do business in this country. For God's sake come to our relief and tell us how we big monopolies can transact business in this country"; and so the cry has gone on from that day to this.

In 1898 several bills were introduced, akin to section 5 of this measure—bills to relieve these great monopolies from the onus of the antitrust law; bills for the purpose of informing them, for they were so ignorant that without advice they could not tell, how they could do business. Bills were introduced, as I said, prepared in New York by the attorney of the Steel Trust. One of those bills, a remarkable bill, segregated all corporations engaged in interstate commerce into corporations operating under the interstate commerce law and all other corporations, and then it provided that the Bureau of Corporations should have jurisdiction over corporations not under the interstate commerce law and should investigate them, and if they gave them a clean bill of health they were to be bidden Godspeed on their journey, and if the Interstate Commerce Commission gave the railroads a clean bill of health they were to be bidden Godspeed on their journey.

Fortunately, that legislation failed to pass. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate, with one accord, vetoed that measure. Section 5 of this bill is of a more homeopathic character, and yet it is in the same trend, in the same direction. The plan of it is: "Do not go for these trusts in court. Charge them with being unfair in their competition, snake them before this wonderful commission, and if this commission determines that they are not guilty of unfair competition, why, God bless you, let them go; they have not violated any law. If the commission does determine that they are guilty of unfair competition, why, make them stop that part of their program; but in God's name let them have a free hand for everything else."

That is all there is in this legislation, in a nutshell. My idea is that we should leave the antitrust law intact.

There has been much criticism here by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] about the antitrust law being so difficult to interpret. There is not any difficulty on the part of the law, nor does the difficulty arise from the varied opinions of the judges. It arises from the fact that the methods by which these monopolies and trusts pursue their calling and carry out their program are as manifold and as intricate and as devious as the cases of fraud and usury. Have you ever found a court that was able to lay down a hard and fast rule as to what constituted fraud? Have you ever found a court that was able to lay down a hard and fast rule as to what constituted usury? No more can you find a hard and fast rule in the courts in respect to violations of the antitrust law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. And yet does the Senator know, in all his experience as a lawyer, of any man really committing an actual fraud who did not know he was engaged in rascally practices every minute he was engaged in that fraud? Does not the man who perpetrates the fraud always know he is perpetrating a fraud?

Mr. NELSON. There are some cases where, of course, it would seem at first blush that it is difficult for a man to know that he is violating the law, and he wants some moral instruction on it.

I remember a case in the neighborhood of my old home in Wisconsin. An old farmer who was very rich loaned out money to his neighbors. They had a very rigid usury law in Wisconsin. No one could get more than 10 per cent interest, and if he took a cent more he forfeited principal and interest combined. This old fellow had this cute way about it: If a poor neighbor came to him to borrow $100, he would scratch his head and say, "Well, money is pretty scarce. I don't know whether I can raise it for you" Then he would chat with him a little while, give him a chew of tobacco if he used chewing tobacco, or give him a pipe to smoke, and then he would take him out into the yard and say, "I have got some fine cows here and colts and steers. If I could sell some of these, I might be able to loan you the $100." Then he would show the poor fellow a $20 cow and say to him, "Now, that cow is worth $50. If you will take that cow for $50, I will loan you $100, and you can give me your note for $150." That was his idea of that transaction; and it never dawned upon him, until the circuit court of Dane County explained to him that that was a case of usury, that it was actually usury. [Laughter.]

It is so with this antitrust law. The law is as broad and as comprehensive as the commerce clause in the Constitution, and the courts, whenever a case has come before them, have met that case upon the facts in each case.

Take the case that I quoted a moment ago. Take the American Tobacco Co. case. Among the grounds which the Supreme Court said were entitled to consideration in determining whether it was a trust and monopoly was this—I read from the opinion in the Tobacco case:

> Because immediately after that combination and the increase of capital which followed the acts which ensued justify the inference that the intention existed to use the power of the combination as a vantage ground to further monopolize the trade in tobacco by means of trade conflicts designed to injure others, either by driving competitors out of the business or compelling them to become parties to a combination—a purpose whose execution was illustrated by the plug war which ensued and its results, and by the snuff war which followed and its results.

If the Senator from Nevada had had his law on the statute books at that time, he might have suppressed the plug war and the snuff war, but the American Tobacco Co. would still have existed as a monopoly. He would have had the glory, through this commission, of stopping competition in plug tobacco and in snuff, and he could not have gone an inch farther.

No, Mr. President. In the first place, I am utterly opposed to section 5, because it is designed—I do not say that was the purpose of the Senator from Nevada or of anybody else, but its manifest purpose and design must be—to act as a kind of a protector, as a kind of a shade, as a kind of a brake for these trusts and monopolies; and, in the next place, as a remedy it is the most harmless pill garlic imaginable. It strikes at only one side of the manifestations of the trusts and nothing else.

Mr. President, it is late in the evening, and I have no desire to enter into a discussion of this matter, but I could not help saying what I have, in view of the peculiar remarks made by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Nevada that the substitute he has reported ought to be printed. I understood the Senator to report a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. I will also offer, besides the amendment I have already presented as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to section 5, an additional section to be called section 11. I will ask that it may be read, and that both may be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Nevada whether it is his purpose to place his bill before the Senate to-morrow and insist upon action?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is my purpose.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Nevada would be kind enough to have all the amendments he has offered, or proposes to offer, printed so that we can have an opportunity to examine them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resolve itself into executive session at this time.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF ASSOCIATE JUSTICE HORACE HARMON LURTON.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, it is my painful office to communicate to the Senate the death at Atlantic City of one of the most distinguished citizens of the United States, Associate Justice Horace Harmon Lurton, of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Justice Lurton, while born in the State of Kentucky, was essentially a citizen of Tennessee, for there he spent the most of his life. He had a judicial career seldom equaled by any citizen in this country. He held, when he was barely eligible to the office, the high office of chancellor. He was for a term associate justice of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, and then chief justice of that court, afterwards judge of the sixth circuit of the United States, senior judge of the United States circuit court of appeals, and Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the office he held when his death occurred yesterday morning; and in all of these eminent offices he so discharged his duties as to justly deserve and enjoy the reputation of being one of the ablest jurists of his day.

Mr. President, I offer the resolutions I send to the desk, and ask for their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee submits resolutions, which will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 417) were read and considered by unanimous consent, as follows:

> Resolved, That the death of Horace Harmon Lurton, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, which occurred in Atlantic City, N. J., at 5 o'clock a. m. yesterday, July 12, 1914, causes profound sorrow and deep regret to the Members of this body.
> Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the distinguished jurist and the services he has rendered his country, the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Tennessee.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 14, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MONDAY, July 13, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Spirit, everywhere present, a potent influence in the affairs of men, strong to deliver, and a very present help in trouble, possess our souls in patience and inspire us with high ideals and earnest purposes, that, in spite of the trying weather, we may fulfill every duty devolving upon us with "malice toward none and charity for all"; that harmony may reign and good legislation obtain; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done after the similitude of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 11, 1914, was read.

CORRECTION OF ROLL.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Mr. ALLEN, and Mr. WATKINS rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest a general correction of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Page 11969 of the RECORD of July 11, 1914, reads:

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names.

The list of the names shows an exact reversal. It should be: "The following Members answered to their names."

Mr. MANN. It should be: "The following Members failed to answer to their names," and those names that are in should be taken out and those not in should be inserted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Perhaps I did not make it clear. It says: "The following Members failed to answer to their names," and then there should follow the names of those who failed to answer. As a matter of fact it says: "The following Members failed to answer to their names," and then there follow the names of those who did answer.

Mr. ALLEN. Would it not be proper to ask unanimous consent that the names of those who were present be stricken from the RECORD and the names of those who were not present be substituted?

Mr. MANN. You will have to ask unanimous consent to have the RECORD corrected. The reporters will take care of that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent to have the RECORD corrected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, one moment. It seems to me that perhaps a statement might be very well made in that connection. The practice of this body and of the Senate is different. In the Senate when there is a roll call, they record the names of those present.

The SPEAKER. The House records the names of those that are not present. It doubtless grew out of confusion in the Government Printing Office in some way.

The request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], as amended by the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], is that the Printing Office be directed to print the matter right. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Many Members came to the Chair about the matter, and one of the reporters finally illuminated the subject to me. I found, very much to my surprise, that up until 26 years ago they printed the RECORD as it is printed this morning. There is a general tendency in nature to revert to the "original type," and I suppose some "old stager" down there got hold of the roll and fixed it as they were accustomed to fix it a quarter of a century ago.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I suggest a correction of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is it about the same thing?

Mr. TAGGART. On Saturday I am recorded as not being present; but I was present and answered to my name.

The SPEAKER. That has all been cleared up.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. By directing the Printing Office to print it as it ought to be printed, will that mean that those who are recorded as not present will be recorded as present? Is it not true that the whole list was present and were recorded as not being present?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. And that will be the correction?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. And the fact is that those who are marked here as not answering to their names did answer?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

The Journal was approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, on last Friday the bill (S. 544) for the relief of the Virginia Military Institute was reported to the House and referred to the Committee on Claims. It belongs to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. RAYBURN, for 10 days, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. FINLEY, for one week, on account of business.

To Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma, until after the Oklahoma primaries on August 4.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of J. E. Stewart, of Cheatham County, Tenn. (H. R. 8357), no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6464. An act for the relief of Charles R. Grant; and

H. R. 5304. An act to increase the efficiency of the aviation service of the Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will make it.

Mr. DONOVAN. I make it in order to ask that our distinguished colleague from Ohio, Dr. FESS, may be allowed to notice that not a single Member of the minority from Ohio is here, or from all New England, at the present moment. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT and Mr. TREADWAY rose.

Mr. MANN. I also would like to make a request.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DONOVAN. Well, I will withdraw the New England part. Not a single minority Member from the great State of Ohio is here.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to make another statement in the RECORD, and that is that if there were no one here from the Connecticut delegation we would be that much better off. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and nine Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, on July 11——

The SPEAKER. Wait until we get through with this. The gentleman from Alabama moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent to correct the RECORD of Saturday, where it is stated that——

The SPEAKER. That has already been straightened out.

Mr. RAKER. My name is mentioned as absent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. They got the wrong list in.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from California had been here, he would have known it.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say to the gentleman that I am here all the time.

The SPEAKER. This whole conversation is out of order.

Mr. RAKER. I know; but the gentleman from Illinois is constantly accusing me of not being here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce, for the benefit of those who were not here at the opening to-day, that when the House met the botch work in the printed roll call in Saturday's RECORD had been straightened out.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation; and, pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate be confined to the subject matter of the bills that may be considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District business; and, pending that, he asks that the general debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bills that are under consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman prepared now to say what bills may be called up in the committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The first bill I expect to call up is the one that relates to the plaza awards. Then if we have time I shall call up the bill relating to policemen and firemen being allowed to ride free on the street cars.

Mr. MANN. That is on the House Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Wherever it may be, I hope to reach it.

Mr. MANN. That would not be in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman expect, when we have gone into committee, to rise after the plaza awards resolution is disposed of?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I may be a little unprepared to answer questions so quickly, but I have over here five bills or measures. One is the Senate joint resolution 129, relating to the plaza awards, and another is the bill H. R. 8847——

Mr. MANN. That is on the House Calendar——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Relating to policemen and firemen riding free on the street cars.

Another is H. R. 17097, to fix the salary of the auditor of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Another is H. R. 1710, to prohibit the intermarriage of persons of the white and negro races within the District of Columbia. Another is for the relief of Clara Dougherty and others.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills relating to the District of Columbia, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

PLAZA AWARDS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up for consideration Senate joint resolution 129, relating to awards and payments thereon in what is commonly known as the Plaza cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas awards for the payment for property taken in the condemnation proceedings for what are commonly known as the Plaza cases were made some time ago and have been subject to examination by the Department of Justice to be approved by it and other authority; and

Whereas the President has found it impracticable to separate the payments which are not in controversy from those which are, leaving those property owners whose claims are not attacked so that payments can not be made to them, involving great consequent hardship: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the awards and payments thereon to be made in such proceedings be, and are hereby, declared to be severable, so that the Department of Justice and the President may order such awards as are not in question to be paid out of any appropriation made therefor, reserving the remainder for further consideration.

With the following amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert the following:

"That the President of the United States shall appoint a commission of three men to complete the acquisition by the United States of so much of the real estate in squares 632, 680, 681, 683, 684, 721, 722, 723, and also that part of square 633 lying east of Arthur Place in the District of Columbia, as in the opinion of the President, is desirable for the extension of the Capitol Grounds. The said commission shall have power to purchase any of said real estate at such a price as the said commission may deem to be the fair market value thereof, not exceeding, however, as to any lot or parcel, the amount of the award made therefor in the condemnation proceeding, district court action numbered 1046, recently pending in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That the purchase price to be paid hereunder for any of said real estate which was owned by either the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. or the Real Estate and Improvement Co. of Baltimore City at the time when said action numbered 1046 was instituted shall not exceed the bona fide, actual, original cost thereof to either of said companies, plus 6 per cent interest thereon from the date of purchase by either of said companies until the date upon which the court confirmed the awards made in the aforesaid district court action numbered 1046.

No purchase herein provided for by said commission shall be deemed to be complete until such purchase shall have been approved by the President of the United States. When the President has so approved, and the Attorney General of the United States has certified that all necessary deeds conveying to the United States the unencumbered, fee simple title to the real estate so purchased have been delivered, the President shall cause payment of the agreed purchase price to be made to the person or persons entitled thereto. All such payments shall be made out of the appropriations heretofore made for the acquisition of said real estate.

Each of the purchases made in pursuance of the provisions of this resolution shall be deemed to be a separate transaction from any other purchase made hereunder.

No person who has within the last five years served on any commission or on any jury in any proceeding to condemn real estate in the District of Columbia shall be eligible to be a member of the commission herein provided for; neither shall any ex-Member of Congress or any Member of Congress be a member of said commission.

Each of the commissioners herein provided for shall, before entering upon the duties of the position, state under oath (or affirmation) that neither he nor any member of his family owns or has a lien upon any real estate, or has any financial interest whatever in any real estate within the zone herein set out; and, further, that neither he nor any member of his family has, since the institution of the court proceeding hereinbefore referred to, owned any stock in any corporation which owns land in said zone; and, further, that neither he nor any member of his family is the creditor of anyone who owns land in said zone; and, further, that neither he nor any member of his family is an officer of or has any stock in any bank, trust company, or other corporation which is the creditor of any person who owns real estate within said zone; and, further, that he is not financially indebted to any person, firm, or corporation which owns real estate in said zone, or who has any loan to any person who owns real estate in said zone; and, further, that he is not indebted to or employed by any person, firm, or corporation which owns or has a lien on real estate in said zone; and, further, that neither he nor any member of his family has, since the institution of the court proceeding hereinbefore referred to, accepted or used any pass or other form of free transportation upon any railroad or subsidiary thereof which owns, directly or indirectly, any real estate within said zone.

The members of said commission shall be paid, out of said appropriations and upon requisition of the President, a reasonable compensation for their services, which shall be determined by agreement between the President and the members of said commission before they enter upon the discharge of their duties.

The said commission may employ a clerk and a stenographer to assist in performing the work herein provided, if they deem such assistance necessary; but the compensation of neither the clerk nor the stenographer shall exceed $5 a day while actually engaged in said work.

All laws to the extent they are in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Not yet. The bill has not been read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is now open for general debate. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. This is the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not yet open for amendment, and has not been read for that purpose.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOGUE. On behalf of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who desire to be heard in connection with this matter, I desire to ask the gentleman as to the time that will be allotted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Whenever the gentleman from Pennsylvania gets the floor—and he will have ample opportunity to get the floor—under the rule he will be recognized for one hour.

Mr. LOGUE. I thought we might make some agreement as to time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. LOGUE. I think an hour would cover it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. How much time do you want?

Mr. LOGUE. An hour under my control for the use of the other members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MANN. We will not agree to that now.

Mr. LOGUE. Very well.

Mr. MANN. Let us see how the debate runs. Several gentlemen want to be heard.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the Members of the House will give their attention to the discussion of this resolution, inasmuch as it involves a project on which the money already spent and the money to be spent amounts to about $4,200,000.

I think it will be well, for the benefit of Members of the House who were not here when this project originated, to give a history of it.

By the act of February, 1903, the Union Station was provided for as it now stands and as it is now located. That change of station involved the change of grades of the streets which approach the Union Station. By the Union Station legislation Congress made a gift to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. and to a subsidiary of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. of $3,000,000 in money, in addition to other valuable grants which will be considered presently. In 1901 Congress passed an act making the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad a present of a million and a half of dollars to assist in the elimination of grade crossings and the erection of the station. The next year a subsidiary road of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. felt that it had been discriminated against because it, too, had not been made a specific present of a million and a half. Then Congress made another appropriation to the subsidiary of the Pennsylvania Railroad of a million and a half dollars. In other words, to those two corporations—to say nothing of land given to them, to say nothing of the street rights and privileges given to them—Congress made a present of $3,000,000. Please bear in mind that the Federal Government for that $3,000,000 did not receive any interest whatever in the Union Station, but simply made to those corporations a present of that much money. At the time that this Union Station project was originated the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad had its depot and tracks on this side of the present station.

The sundry civil appropriation bill of June 25, 1910, contains a provision relative to the acquirement of this property, which is commonly known as the Plaza land.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was not that a Senate amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman had not asked this question when he did, it would have been unnecessary, because I was coming to that in the very next sentence. The sundry civil appropriation bill as reported to the House in June, 1910, had nothing whatever in it about the acquisition of this park. After that bill passed the House and went to the Senate the Senate put upon it an amendment authorizing the acquirement of these 10 or 12 squares as a park. I wish to invite your attention to this particular feature of it, that that amendment put on by the Senate and afterwards adopted in this House upon the report of the conference committee, provided that this property should be acquired, but that no more than $500,000 worth should be acquired in any one year. Operating under that provision, an annual appropriation of $500,000 was made. A second appropriation of $500,000 and a third appropriation of the same amount was subsequently made. After two of the three appropriations of $500,000 were available the commission, composed of the then Vice President, Mr. Sherman, the then Speaker of the House, Mr. Cannon, and the then and now Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, Mr. Elliott Woods, directed that proceedings be instituted in the District courts, and they were instituted, for the purpose of acquiring by condemnation the two squares that lie directly west of the Senate Office Building. To those two squares I wish to direct your attention. Some of the statements in the public press of the city of Washington has left not only the public but the Members of this House to infer that while the houses on those two squares have been torn down and carried away they have not been paid for. Exactly the contrary is true.

These houses which have been torn down have been paid for, and they were paid for long ago. They were paid for out of the three appropriations of $500,000 each. The first two $500,000 appropriations were not sufficient to pay for them. One hundred thousand and some odd dollars of the third appropriation, making eleven hundred and some odd thousand dollars were used to acquire and pay for these two squares upon which buildings have been demolished.

Mr. WINGO. These two squares the gentleman speaks of are immediately west of the Senate Office Building?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. As I said before, they are the two squares lying immediately west of the Senate Office Building and upon which the buildings have been demolished.

Mr. BATHRICK. The gentleman means to say that not only the houses but the land had been paid for?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; the land and also the buildings. The Vice President, Mr. Sherman, died. Then we had left two commissioners—the then Speaker of the House, Mr. Cannon, and the present Superintendent of Capitol Building and Grounds, Mr. Elliott Woods. Now, mind you, at a time when there was in full force and effect the provision that an amount not exceeding $500,000 should be used in any one year for that purpose, this commission, in open defiance of that statutory provision, next proceeded to condemn all the remainder of the land in question, which was valued at $3,204,434.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that the Attorney General of the United States said that that was in conformity with the law and not as the gentleman says—in open defiance of the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not. I will say that when the first condemnation proceeding was filed by this commission that the allegations of the petition show that the commission was aware of the provision limiting their power of acquisition in any year to land worth not exceeding $500,000; but in the second proceeding to condemn more than $3,000,000 worth of property, according to the awards, when there had been no change in the law, they omitted these allegations.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that when the first condemnation proceeding was filed it was identically the same as when the last was filed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The law was the same. I agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. MANN. When the first condemnation proceedings were filed there had not been appropriated $1,500,000, enough to pay for the two squares. The Attorney General decided that they had the right under the law to file condemnation proceedings if any part of the sum had been appropriated. Of course, they could not pay more than $500,000 a year. But when the gentleman says that it was in open defiance of the law I ask him if he is familiar with the fact that it was done in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman, in the latter part of his question, refers to the second proceeding, I will say that I am not familiar with the assumed fact that it was done under a ruling of the Attorney General that the law authorized the commission to institute any such proceeding. In view of the plain letter of the statute I am at a loss to understand how the Attorney General could have so ruled, and I do not believe that he did. I have respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, but I take issue with him there, and I say that I do not believe that his position upon that point is correct.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will not take issue in a moment. The first condemnation proceeding was requested by the commission on July 1, 1911, and the court proceedings were commenced on August 13, 1911. That was before the $1,500,000 had been appropriated, as the gentleman will admit. The first appropriation of $500,000 was made in 1910, and there had not been then appropriated the $1,500,000, or enough to pay for these proceedings.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Repeating, I will say that three $500,000 annual appropriations had been made before the second proceeding was instituted. The petition in the first proceeding contains evidence that the commission were undertaking to observe the limitation of $500,000 a year. They, in fact, encroached upon the third $500,000 appropriation something more than $100,000. Therefore there was paid for the two squares which lie west of the Senate Office Building something more than $1,100,000.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. POST. For the gentleman's information I will say that the awards for the two blocks were confirmed by the court on the 18th of May, 1912, and the last $500,000 appropriation was made in the sundry civil bill of August 24, 1912.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this digression has not had much connection with the real issue. It suffices to say that when the law stood as it was originally enacted the commission filed a suit to condemn land valued at about $3,200,000, when they had no legal right to condemn more than $500,000 worth.

At this point, and before getting further into the argument of the case, I desire to invite attention to an article that appeared in the Washington Herald day before yesterday, July 11, 1914. That paper seems to speak not for any individual who owns property within the zone sought to be acquired, but it does seem to speak for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. I will insert the article in the RECORD, which is as follows:

PLAZA BILL SUBSTITUTE IS DOOMED TO DEFEAT—JOHNSON'S RESOLUTION FOR NONMEMBER COMMISSION REGARDED AS IMPEACHING INTEGRITY OF HOUSE—BITTER FIGHT IS PREDICTED.

Every indication points to defeat in the House on the substitute resolution of Chairman BEN JOHNSON, of the District Committee, upon the Plaza awards. By innuendo, at least, through the mere introduction of his substitute, JOHNSON is regarded as having impeached the integrity of the whole House by making not only present Members, but all past Members, their relatives, friends, debtors, and creditors, dead or alive, ineligible to membership on the commission.

But if indications are to be relied on, the fight will not be of long duration, and the results are overwhelmingly against the substitute resolution. For this reason neither the chairman nor his substitute has yet been taken seriously by the other Members. Certainly not by many, it seems.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. officials are reported to be laughing up their sleeves over the proposition that would entirely disregard the present fair market value of their Plaza property.

The law officers of that corporation, it is predicted, would certainly raise what is believed by Washington lawyers a simple but effective constitutional objection to being deprived of their vested interests in this or any other property of the exercise of the right of eminent domain without being paid a fair market price.

Not what might have been considered fair when Representative Tawney, whether with or without authority, said on the floor of the House that the Baltimore & Ohio would accept the original cost price plus 6 per cent interest, but what the property would bring now in the open real estate market.

The railroad company is apparently waiting only for Mr. JOHNSON to shoot out his trump.

It must be known to all of you that this paper is the official organ in this vicinity of the "interests." It is not at all surprising that it should misrepresent and sneer when anyone seeks to compel any railroad company to treat the public fairly. But it is surprising that this organ of the interests should undertake to state in advance what the position of the House would be on any legislation affecting the railroads. For it to do so is an insult to the membership of the House, because it implies a knowledge that no such organ should possess.

To return to the history of this project. When this matter was being considered by the House on June 23, 1910, following the presentation of the conference report, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] opposed the conference report. I shall read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not in favor of acquiring it at all, but if we are going to acquire it at all, in my judgment the Senate proposition was a very much better proposition than the one offered by the House conferees.

Mr. SULZER. I quite agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. SIMS. Why do we want to acquire this property, with street car tracks running all around and through it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think we need it or want it.

Mr. SIMS. On what pretense do they base their claim for the appropriation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know. There is no necessity for it on account of public buildings. We have just bought a piece of land down near the Treasury Department for public buildings. We have room in the Mall for other public buildings. I do not think it is contended by anyone that this property should be used for public building sites, and I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee that it is not a suitable place to establish a public park. Therefore I hope the conference report will be disagreed to.

In the same connection, on page 8338 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, just referred to, this colloquy occurred:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me ask the gentleman, Are not several blocks of this land owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was formerly owned by them down where the old station was, if they have not sold it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I may be mistaken, but my understanding is that they do not own it at present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman state whether or not they have not tried to sell the land to the Government?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not to my knowledge.

Later, Mr. Tawney, who was the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and who had this whole appropriation bill in charge, took care of what promised to be a serious obstacle to the passage of the bill. He said:

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit me, and I can have the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], this is what I think the agreement is between the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Government: If the Government hereafter purchases the land from the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., the understanding is that it is to pay the price the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. paid for the property, plus 6 per cent. That is already agreed to.

Let me repeat, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Tawney, in charge of this bill, said, "That is already agreed to." It will be seen, however, that Mr. Tawney at that time inadvertently uses the name of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. instead of the Baltimore &

Ohio Railroad Co. I should add in that connection that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. owns no property within this zone—that whatever railroad property is owned within this zone is owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. or the holding company of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. own any land within that zone at that time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It did not at that time own any. Reverting a moment to the second condemnation proceeding, for the enlightenment of those who have not studied it, I would state that the situation is about this: The suit was brought by the attorney for the commission to condemn—according to the awards—about $3,200,000 worth of property in one proceeding, when the law was plain that they could not, with any deference to the statute, condemn more than $500,000 worth in any one year. I will read that section of the statute referring to the amount which the commission was authorized to acquire in any one year. It is plain, and reads as follows:

If in any year there should not be offered property substantially up to the sum of $500,000, at its fair value or less, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds are authorized to institute condemnation proceedings in order to secure any or all of the land herein authorized to be acquired, but for not to exceed what they estimate to be $500,000 worth in any one fiscal year.

Not only did the commission disregard this plain limitation, but the proceedings were so instituted that when it came to the President of the United States for his approval—and the law required either his approval or his disapproval—the President found, according to the opinion of the Attorney General, as I am informed, that he must either approve all of those awards or reject all of them. In other words, they were not severable. The President, as we all know, disapproved of the awards because a part of them were excessive. In other words, he disapproved those awards because he felt unwilling to put his hand into the Treasury of the people to pay to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. nearly $600,000 more than they had agreed to take for their property. Some gentlemen, no doubt, right here will ask, Did the Baltimore & Ohio people agree to take the original cost plus 6 per cent interest for their property? Mr. Chairman, Mr. Tawney stood upon this floor as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and unhesitatingly said to this House, inadvertently using the name of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., that such a settlement had already been agreed to. Those are his words. Where is the man, I ask, who will stand here and impugn the integrity of former Representative Tawney? I am not he. I stand here in his absence to defend him and to say that I most sincerely believe that upon that occasion he had the information from which to get the truth and spoke the truth to this House. But Mr. Tawney is corroborated in another way. I hold in my hand a copy of a letter, which I will read. At the top of the letter appear "Hamilton & Colbert, attorneys and counselors at law, Century Building, 412 Fifth Street, Washington, D. C.," and also "Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., George E. Hamilton, local counsel." That letter is dated April 10, 1902, and is addressed to Maj. John Biddle, engineer commissioner. At that time Maj. John Biddle was the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia. The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1902.

Maj. JOHN BIDDLE,
Engineer Commissioner.

DEAR SIR: Referring to memorandum of prices paid by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. for property in squares 630, 678, 679, 680, 683, and 684, I have to say that squares 678 and 679 were inadvertently included, and as these squares are contained in the area of the Massachusetts Avenue terminal the company, of course, will require them.

Referring to the property in the other squares enumerated above, I have to say that the prices quoted to you were the actual prices paid for the land and did not include the cost of conveyancing or the interest on the purchase money since the date of these purchases. The property referred to has been acquired from time to time during the last four years, and the company thinks that a reasonable arrangement would be for the District, in addition to the actual purchase price, to add, in order to cover interest, abstract of title, and conveyancing, 6 per cent for two years, which would be less than the average time of holding by the company. If, therefore, to such of the property as you may need, excluding squares 678 and 679, you add to the purchase price given 6 per cent for two years, the result will give you the company's position as to these properties.

As to square 632, we understood that that square was not included in the arrangement talked of between yourself and President Loree, and therefore nothing need be said in regard to it.

Square 681 was purchased by the company about 1870 or 1871 at an average cost of 80 cents per square foot. Much of this property was unused until comparatively recent years, and the company thinks that in order to cover the interest, etc., on the purchase money during the period when it was not used that a fair value to place upon this property would be $1.40 a foot, which is something less than was paid by the company recently for properties in square 680 and square 678. At $1.40 per foot, the price of this square is $235,478.60.

As stated to you a few days ago, I have no personal knowledge of the agreement between President Loree and yourself, and, of course, when President Loree returns the matter can be, if desired, taken up again and placed in definite shape.

Yours, very truly,
GEORGE E. HAMILTON.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What position did Mr. Hamilton occupy toward the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This letterhead says, "George E. Hamilton, local counsel, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman know what authority he had to bind the railroad company, being the local counsel?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that I do not know, but I believe the gentleman knows of Mr. George E. Hamilton sufficiently well to know that he is one of the most prominent attorneys in the District of Columbia, and that he would not have written a letter relating to the business of his client unless he had authority to do so. I would not so impugn his integrity.

As I was about to say when I was interrupted, this letter corroborates the statement made by Mr. Tawney that the Baltimore & Ohio people had made a proposition to take original cost plus 6 per cent interest for their property.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman a copy of the bid or offer which the company made to the commission, and is he going to produce that later?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman I will say that I have that, but when they came to price this property to the commission they did not price it at what it had cost them. They did not give the correct figures in several instances, and I can establish that fact.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I understood—and I ask for information—that when the commission advertised for bids the Baltimore & Ohio, or whatever company owned the real estate representing them, made a bid—or perhaps it was before they advertised for bids—without naming the price, proposing to sell the property for the original cost, plus the money they had used in filling the property, plus taxes and 6 per cent interest. I did not know whether the gentleman had a copy of that. I suppose that would have been with the original papers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think I have it somewhere, but I am not quite sure. In any event, I have seen or heard something of it in going through the record. But I do not think that the gentleman from Illinois states the proposal correctly.

Mr. MANN. I think it would be very informing if the gentleman would produce it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can say this: At every stage since this legislation was enacted the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad has asked more for its property than the agreed price stated by Mr. Tawney, and more than the figures contained in the letter written by Mr. Hamilton, attorney for that company. Now, please bear in mind that a fight was being made upon the conference report relating to the acquisition of this property, and that fight was being led by the present leader of this House [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. The vote was close—141 voted to pass it and 131 voted against its passage. A change of 6 votes would have changed the result. Who doubts that but for the statements made upon this floor by Mr. Tawney, who was in charge of the conference report, that this property was to be acquired at its original cost plus 6 per cent interest, the original bill would not have passed? Therefore, I say that the main question which now arises is, Shall the Public Treasury be invaded to pay to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad nearly $600,000 more for their property than they asked, as an inducement for the passage of this bill by the House?

We can not escape the conclusion that there has been a concert of movement somewhere which in every instance redounded to the benefit of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. In the first place, the people who lived in that zone, rich and poor, found themselves connected and bound together with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Later that company was placed in this position, viz, all of these awards had to be disapproved by the President of the United States or they would get $600,000 more than they had asked. Was it a mere coincidence that the law authorizing the condemnation proceeding was violated and that the direct effect of such violation was that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. was associated in the condemnation proceedings with a lot of poor people, many of whom were women? Was it expected that these poor people and these women should pull them through? Moreover, there is another feature that suggests an inquiry. These condemnation awards were returned to the courts on January 20, 1913, shortly before the termination of President Taft's term of office.

Upon the awards being filed the court allowed 30 days within which exceptions to the awards might be filed and continued the case until the 6th day of March, 1913, two days after President Taft's term of office would have expired. But what next was done? Let me tell you, counsel representing the commission in this proceeding, on February 24, 1913, went into court and moved that those awards be confirmed, notwithstanding the 30 days had not yet expired by four days. President Taft approved the awards in the first proceeding, notwithstanding, as I believe, some of them were excessive. Is it unreasonable for us to believe that the law fixing the amount to be condemned in any one year was violated and that later the confirmation of the awards was rushed through in order to keep this entire matter in safe hands? Is it illogical to conclude that the intention was that Woodrow Wilson, with his clear head and his great respect of law and justice, should not be permitted to scrutinize what had been done? If such were the intention it seemed for a while that it would be successful. The amount needed to pay the awards, including the excessive allowances to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., was inserted by the Senate in the sundry civil bill, which was to and did reach President Taft before his term expired. But as the plans of mice and men sometimes fail so, in the present case, an unforeseen contingency upset any calculations on this subject. President Taft vetoed the sundry civil bill because of his objections to certain limitations on expenditures for prosecutions under the Sherman law which affected farmers and laborers' organizations, and the bill was not again passed until Woodrow Wilson became President of the United States.

The President, I know, has sympathized most deeply with the smaller property holders who have their property tied up in this proceeding. But, being the strong, the courageous, the just man that he is, he was compelled, through force of circumstances, to deny his approval to the awards, notwithstanding that this action on his part resulted in disappointment to those whose awards he would have approved had he been given the opportunity of doing so. Now the question comes, What is this House to do? I say that this House ought to authorize some plan by which these individual property holders, whose property has not been excessively valued, can be paid for their property. But I go further, and say that we ought not to permit the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad again to hang onto the skirts of these individual property holders and by our legislation be pulled through to a position to which they are not entitled. Senate joint resolution No. 129 was, in the Senate, referred to and acted upon favorably by the District of Columbia Committee. Recently it passed the Senate. It came to us and was referred to the District of Columbia Committee. When it came before the committee it was discussed both formally and informally by the members of the committee. The result of this discussion was that the bill was reported by the House District of Columbia Committee to this House with amendments. I hope Members have read these amendments in the report which is now before you; but for the benefit of those who have not read them and have not ascertained the difference between the Senate bill and the House bill, I ask your indulgence that I may show you the difference. The Senate joint resolution is very short and provides:

That the awards and payments thereon to be made in such proceedings be, and are hereby, declared to be severable, so that the Department of Justice and the President may order such awards as are not in question to be paid out of any appropriation made therefor, reserving the remainder for further consideration.

One important feature of the amended bill is that there is a provision that the President shall appoint a commission of three men to go and purchase from these individuals their different pieces of property and to pay for them whatever they think they are worth, not exceeding, as to any parcel, the price which the condemnation commission has heretofore fixed for it. The exception is that this commission shall not purchase from the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. its property at a price exceeding the original cost plus 6 per cent interest.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. POST. How is the Government to procure, under the gentleman's resolution, the Baltimore & Ohio property if it refuses to accept the terms of the resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I did not catch the question of the gentleman.

Mr. POST. How will the Government acquire the property of the Baltimore & Ohio which is sought to be acquired if it refuses to accept the terms of this resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Why, I will ask the gentleman, in return, another question. Does he know of an individual property owner who will not accept these terms? Is not the man in whom you are interested, Mr. McDowell, begging and pleading that you help pass the bill so that he can get what the condemnation jury awarded him?

Mr. POST. That is true, but you do not answer my question. The question I put to you was, How is the Government to acquire the Baltimore & Ohio property under your resolution unless they accept the terms of the resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will get to it in the regular course of my argument. As I was saying when I was interrupted, the Government is authorized to buy the property of the Baltimore & Ohio at a price not exceeding original cost plus 6 per cent interest. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] asked how the Government is to acquire the property of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. I say to him this, that I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that this property has never been needed. If the property of the Baltimore & Ohio is to be acquired for nearly $600,000 more than it is worth, I say that we should stand like Woodrow Wilson stands, and not be forced to buy that which we do not need.

Now, as I said, the President has refused to put his stamp of approval upon this whole transaction. The Attorney General of the United States advised the President, as I am informed, that as all the parties were joined in one suit the awards could not be separated. Then when the President refused to put his stamp of approval upon these excessive awards the Attorney General went into open court and asked for the entrance of an order to dismiss these proceedings. The individual property owners to a man, or to a woman, acquiesced in this step. Their acquiescence has put them out of court. But the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and its holding company have gone into court and have appealed from that ruling of the court dismissing those proceedings. The individuals whom we are not opposing are out of court. There is no proceeding now under which one foot of their property can be condemned. The only way, and the quickest way, to acquire their property now is by voluntary sale to a commission provided for in this bill, notwithstanding the intimations of the Washington Herald that it would be unconstitutional, or something of that sort, for the commission to acquire their property by purchase.

Now, then, to repeat, the individuals are out of court, and there is no condemnation law under which they can get back, and they have not appealed. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad has appealed from the decision of the court dismissing the former condemnation proceeding. Now, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad is still in court.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In just a minute. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad is still in court. If they have rights there, if the award to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad is res adjudicata, then they have it, and the United States Government may, if their contention is right, be compelled to take this property at a price which the President of the United States has said is extortionate.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST].

Mr. POST. I understood the gentleman to say that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad had appealed from the order dismissing the condemnation proceedings.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Filed a motion to set it aside, which is practically the same thing.

Mr. POST. That is different—pending upon a motion to set aside an entry of dismissal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is six of one and half a dozen of the other.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Is the property that is owned by individuals so situated relative to the property owned by the railroad company that it can be purchased and used for park purposes and leave the other?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will answer the gentleman a little more fully than by the answer "yes" or "no." The main part of the property, which lies between the Capitol Building and the Union Station, is owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad; and I may say that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad owns square No. 721, down to the northeast of the railroad station and on the other side of Massachusetts Avenue, which runs in front of the Union Station. Back there they have square No. 721. They did not desire to sell only that part of their property which lies between the Union Station and the Capitol in order that a park might be made there, but they also included in this project square No. 721, which lies back and almost behind the Union Station—at least to the east of it—and is in no sense between the Union Station and the Capitol Building. But lying in front of square No. 721, owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, are two other squares. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad knew at the time that it projected this scheme that they could not sell square No. 721 to the Government unless at the same time they induced the Federal Government to take the two squares, owned by individuals, which lie in front of it.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. POST. The report that was made by the commission, now contained in Senate Document 1394, and by a majority of the commission, Mr. Cannon and Mr. Elliott Woods, gives the appraisement—and I have a copy of it here—of lot No. 721, and not a single foot of ground in lot 721 is reported as being owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That does not make any difference. I have before me here a map made by Mr. Richards, assessor of the District of Columbia, and he shows, having it marked in red, that it is owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact is the name on the assessor's list may or may not be the name of the true owner of the property.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I take it for granted that mistakes can be made anywhere.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And that accounts for the fact that the assessor's list may disclose the names of persons who at the time did not own the property.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have the report of the commission for enlarging the Capitol grounds, and on page 26 thereof, as to square No. 721, and over on page 27 thereof, we find this language:

The Real Estate & Improvement Co., of Baltimore city, was the only person appearing before the commission claiming the ownership of the title to the said fee simple.

Further down on that same page it says:

The Real Estate & Improvement Co., of Baltimore city, was the only person appearing before the commission claiming the ownership of the title to the said fee simple.

Then, further down on the page, it says:

The Real Estate & Improvement Co., of Baltimore city, was the only person appearing before the commission claiming the ownership of the title to the said fee simple.

Still further down the commission's report says:

The Real Estate & Improvement Co., of Baltimore city, was the only person appearing before the commission claiming the ownership of the title to the said fee simple.

Then there is one at the top of the page that I overlooked, which reads as follows:

Parcels Nos. 13 to 17, both inclusive: We appraise the value of the owner of the fee simple of the premises included in these parcels at $21,481.

The Real Estate & Improvement Co., of Baltimore city, was the only person appearing before the commission claiming the ownership of the title to the said fee simple.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In just one second. Now, then, the Real Estate & Improvement Co., of Baltimore, is the real estate holding company of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and in the District of Columbia they own millions of dollars' worth of property, although under their charter they have not the right to own a single foot of land here except for legitimate and necessary railroad purposes. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOGUE. Does not parcel 721, or square 721, embrace 129 separate parcels?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know. The gentleman may have counted them correctly, and probably has done so. I have never counted them.

Mr. LOGUE. In the part you are reading does not that appear?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I find a lot of them consolidated. Here I see:

Parcels Nos. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, and 42: These parcels are not to be taken in this proceeding, and are therefore not appraised by this commission.

Then I see:

Parcel No. 45: We appraise the value of the owner of the fee simple of the premises included in this parcel at $2,520.

And then the following:

Parcels Nos. 46 and 47: We appraise the value of the owner of the fee simple of the premises included in these parcels at $5,040.

And then this:

Parcels Nos. 48, 49, 133, and 134: We appraise the value of the owner of the fee simple of the premises included in these parcels at $10,080.

And so forth, and so on. I do not know how many there are; I have not counted them. But the fact remains that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. owns a part of that square through its holding company.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman this one question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand the situation to be that individuals owning property in this lot, between here and the station, are satisfied with the condemnation proceedings, and that the prices set out in those proceedings are agreeable to them and they want a settlement, but that the trouble comes with the price that is to be paid to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In answer to the gentleman I will say this: That I have not seen an individual owner of property within that zone—and I have seen a great many of them—who is not willing and most anxious to take the amount awarded to him. But we can not state officially, neither could the District Supreme Court state officially, whether or not everybody was satisfied, because the attorney representing this condemnation commission went into court 4 days before the 30 days had expired and had those awards, one and all, confirmed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OGLESBY. He could not have had those awards confirmed by the court without notice to the property owners if they had objected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Let me say to the gentleman that I know that what he says could not be legally done, was done. You have heard of the man who said he could not be put in jail for a certain thing, but he was in jail. The gentleman now says that the court could not confirm those awards before the 30 days' time had expired, but nevertheless the court did do so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was on notice, was it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There was no notice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know as to the fact. I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Without notice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The attorney for this commission was Mr. Strickland, the Assistant Attorney General of the United States in charge of the condemnation proceedings in the District of Columbia?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am asking the gentleman whether this notice was given to those holders?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No, sir. There was no notice to the individual owners of the property. I am not here speaking for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. I do not know whether it had notice or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am simply asking whether, under the proceedings here in the adjustment of the awards of the commission, the awards can be confirmed without notice having been given to the various parties interested?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know whether the court abused its authority or not when it confirmed the awards; but I say that it is within the range of possibility, at least, that an act of injustice to one or more of the individuals may have been done when the awards were approved before the time had expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. MANN. Returning to the lot or square 721, I see by the book which I hold, which the gentleman just held in his hand a moment ago, that there are 129 lots in that square.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I did not count them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not have to count them. It shows on the table itself, on page 30. The list, the schedule, covers every lot from 1 to 129. As to 75 of them, the title was not acquired by condemnation proceedings. The gentleman read—I do not know how many times—the name of the Real Estate & Improvement Co., of Baltimore city——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I did not count them.

Mr. MANN. But I think the gentleman duplicated several of them, although inadvertently——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. It appears five times. Now, if the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. owns 5 or 10 or 15 lots out of 50 or 60, it is not fair that we should be led to believe by the gentleman's statement—I acquit him of any intention to mislead—that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. owned that square. I supposed, until I looked at the paper that the gentleman was reading from, that that was the case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will hand to the gentleman my own map of that immediate locality, made and given to me by the assessor for the District of Columbia, Mr. Richards.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the assessor——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That shows that the square 721 is cut into two pieces by a little, short, narrow street called "California Street," extending just that one square. The north end or the northern half of that square 721 is owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., according to information given to me by the assessor, who assesses it, and the southern end of square 721 is owned by various individuals.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the map shows. I take the statement of the gentleman, of course, as to the map. But I much prefer to take the statement of men who look at the records as to the ownership of property than that of the assessor, who does not. Here is a statement of the ownership by lots; the ownership as to each lot of the whole 129 lots. It is an official statement. It would be more convincing to me than a map gotten up by the assessor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman just here that if he will take the whole report and read it he will find instance after instance where the assessors have charged ownership to various parties on some of that land, and have collected the taxes on it, and yet the commission to which you refer say they do not know who own it.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the assessors do not assess real estate taxes against individuals; they assess them against the land.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They assess taxes against the land, and then they advise the tax collector from whom to collect it.

Mr. MANN. The tax collector does not go to individuals to collect the taxes on real estate. They go to the office of the tax collector and pay the taxes. The gentleman never heard of the tax collector going around from house to house and collecting the taxes on real estate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The tax collector does not, in fact, collect all of the taxes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman never heard of a real estate tax collector going out and collecting taxes on real estate. People go to his office and pay the taxes. If they do not, the land is sold for the taxes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then we have the wonderful phenomenon presented to this District, if that is true, of all those who own property going to the office of the tax collector and paying their taxes, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] knows that year after year one concern, at the head of which is a Mr. Wiltsie, of Syracuse, N. Y., comes down here to the District of Columbia, and buys in hundreds of pieces of property for the unpaid taxes; and you have an item in a bill which proposes to repay to Mr. Wiltsie some money on account of a piece of property which he acquired at a tax sale. And perhaps it is right to do so.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. BURNETT. I notice that in the gentleman's schedule he has left out lot 682. That is in the original bill. Was that left out intentionally or unintentionally?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Where is that?

Mr. BURNETT. On page 2, lot 682 is left out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that if there is any square or lot left out it was done inadvertently and not intentionally. It was done either by the clerk who wrote it, or by the printer.

Mr. BURNETT. I wanted to inquire whether there was any reason for leaving it out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. So far as I know, if it has been left out, it has been unintentionally left out.

It was perhaps inevitable that this proceeding, conceived and conducted in defiance of law, should be productive of no good results. We need not be surprised, therefore, to find that the property of the chief beneficiary of all this legislation and litigation, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., was so excessively valued that the President of the United States felt constrained to interpose his veto in order to prevent this raid upon the Treasury.

To my mind it is clear that this entire proceeding was void, because the court was without jurisdiction of the subject matter—a defect that can not be waived. It is elementary that while consent may give jurisdiction of the parties it can not confer upon the court jurisdiction of the subject matter which is otherwise lacking. The clause of the act of June 25, 1910, which relates to this subject is in this language:

> If in any year there should not be offered property substantially up to said sum of $500,000 at its fair value or less, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds are authorized to institute condemnation proceedings in order to secure any or all of the land herein authorized to be acquired, but for not to exceed what they estimate to be $500,000 worth in any one fiscal year.

Could language be plainer? Could Congress have expressed more clearly the intention that the court proceedings authorized by the act should not in any year adjudicate upon property worth more than $500,000? If so, this is a limitation upon the jurisdiction of the court. It does not answer to say that the provision is a limitation upon the power of the commission alone. Of course, the acts of the commission were ultra vires and void, but we can not stop here. To assert that a statutory commission is without power to institute an action and yet to assert that the court, whose powers are defined and limited by the same statute, has legal power to entertain it is, to my mind, a contradiction in terms. The controlling feature is that the court proceeding which Congress intended to authorize was a proceeding limited to a condemnation of $500,000 worth of land in any year.

While the District Supreme Court, in which this proceeding was instituted, is a court of general jurisdiction, in the condemnation of this particular land its jurisdiction was expressly defined and limited by special act which supersedes the general law on this subject. It is therefore as to this proceeding a court of limited jurisdiction, and when it exceeded that jurisdiction, under all authority its acts were void. In no sense is the limitation regulative of procedure. Under the very letter of the act all questions of procedure are to be governed by the act of August 30, 1890. Limitations upon the amount to be adjudicated by a court are always regarded as regulative of the jurisdiction of the court rather than of procedure.

In condemnation proceedings, which involve the exercise of the highest powers of sovereignty, limitations of authority or jurisdiction are more quickly apprehended and rigidly enforced than in any other class of cases. In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, seventh edition, page 759, we find this statement of the law:

> The right to appropriate private property to public uses lies dormant in the State until legislative action is had, pointing out the occasions, the modes, conditions, and agencies for its appropriations. Private property can only be taken pursuant to law, but a legislative act declaring the necessity, being the customary mode in which the fact is determined, must be held to be for this purpose "the law of the land," and no further finding or adjudication can be essential unless the constitution of the State has expressly required it. When, however, action is had for this purpose there must be kept in view that general as well as reasonable and just rule that whenever in pursuance of the law the property of an individual is to be divested by proceedings against his will a strict compliance must be had with all the provisions of law which are made for his protection and benefit or the proceeding will be ineffectual. Those provisions must be regarded as in the nature of conditions precedent, which are not only to be observed and complied with before the right of the property owner is disturbed, but the party claiming authority under the adverse proceedings must show affirmatively such compliance.

After discussing certain rules applicable to private corporations which possess this extraordinary right, the author continues:

> And substantially the same strict rule is applied when the State itself seeks to appropriate private property, for it is not unreasonable that the property owner should have the right to insist that the State, which selects the occasion and prescribes the conditions for the appropriation of his property, should confine its action strictly within the limits which it has marked out as sufficient. So high a prerogative as that of divesting one's estate against his will should only be exercised where the plain letter of the law permits it and under a careful observance of the formalities prescribed for the owner's protection.

Judge Cooley defines jurisdiction of the subject matter to be the "authority to take cognizance of, try, and determine cases of that description." (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, p. 575). Adopting the definition, the District Supreme Court in this proceeding, under the very letter of the act of June 25, 1910, neither had the authority to take cognizance of nor to try nor to determine a condemnation proceeding in any year where the amount involved exceeded $500,000.

It may be urged that the objection to the jurisdiction of the court should have been promptly made in this proceeding. But failure to do so on the part of those who undertook to put themselves above the law can not validate the proceeding. I take the following statement of the law on this subject from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 575:

The proceedings in any court are void if it wants the jurisdiction of the case in which it has assumed to act. (a) Jurisdiction is, first, of the subject matter, and, second, of the persons whose rights are to be passed upon.

A court has jurisdiction of any subject matter if, by the law of its organization, it has authority to take cognizance of, try, and determine cases of that description. If it assumes to act in a case over which the law does not give it authority, the proceeding and judgment will be altogether void, and rights of property can not be divested by means of them.

It is a maxim in the law that consent can never confer jurisdiction, by which is meant that the consent of parties can not empower a court to act upon subjects which are not submitted to its determination and judgment by the law. The law creates courts, and upon considerations of general public policy defines and limits their jurisdiction, and this can neither be enlarged nor restricted by the act of the parties.

Accordingly, where a court by law has no jurisdiction of the subject matter of a controversy, a party whose rights are sought to be affected by it is at liberty to repudiate its proceedings and refuse to be bound by them, notwithstanding he may once have consented to this action, either by voluntarily commencing the proceedings as plaintiff or as defendant by appearing and pleading to the merits, or by any other formal or informal action. This right he may avail himself of at any stage of the case, and the maxim that requires one to move promptly who would take advantage of an irregularity does not apply here, since this is not mere irregular action but a total want of power to act at all. Consent is sometimes implied from failure to object, but there can be no waiver of rights by laches in a case where consent would be altogether nugatory.

In the case of In re Terry (128 U. S., 289; 32 Law Ed., 405) the court, quoting with approval from Ex parte Fiske (133 U. S., 713), said:

When a court of the United States undertakes by its process of contempt to punish a man for refusing to comply with an order which that court has no authority to make, the order itself, being without jurisdiction, is void, and the order punishing for contempt is equally void. It is well settled now, in the jurisprudence of this court, that when the proceeding for contempt in such a case results in imprisonment this court will, by its writ of habeas corpus, discharge the prisoner. A judgment which lies without the jurisdiction of the court, even one of superior jurisdiction and general authority, is, upon reason and authority, a nullity.

In the case of Wilson v. Walker (109 U. S., 258; 27 Law Ed., 927) the court adopted the language used in Bigelow v. Forrest (9 Wall., 339), quoting:

Doubtless a decree of a court having jurisdiction to make the decree can not be collaterally impeachable, but under the act of Congress the district court had no power to order a sale which should confer on the purchaser rights outlasting the life of French Forrest. And the judgment of the court was that so much of the decree of the district court as was in excess of its powers was void. * * *

* * * The doctrine invoked by counsel, that when a court has once acquired jurisdiction it has a right to decide every question which arises in the case, and its judgment, however erroneous, can not be collaterally assailed, is undoubtedly correct as a general proposition, but is subject to many qualifications in its application. It is only correct when the court proceeds after acquiring jurisdiction of the cause, according to established modes governing the class to which the case belongs, and does not transcend in the extent or character of its judgment of the law which is applicable to it.

Nothing that is here said calls into question the legal proposition that the right of eminent domain, plenary in character and almost unlimited in extent, inheres in the Government as an incident of sovereignty. But this right must be exercised on the subjects Congress shall select and in the manner that Congress shall provide. Congress alone may define the position of the Government in such matters. Notwithstanding shadowy distinctions between procedure and jurisdiction may be made, there is no fair-minded man who will deny that the court proceeding which Congress intended to authorize was one wherein the amount involved in any year should not exceed $500,000. This plainly expressed intention of Congress, which was a material inducement for the passage of the act, can not be thwarted by refined distinctions and labored constructions.

If the money of the people is to be used to enable the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to get rid of its unprofitable holdings, it is not unreasonable to demand that the law that permits this to be done should undertake to prevent a recurrence of the fraudulent valuations recently condemned by the President. The District Committee resolution limits the price to be paid for voluntary purchases from this company to the amount stated by Mr. Tawney as having been agreed upon, viz, original cost plus 6 per cent interest. In addition to what has already been said, I submit the following reasons why such a provision should be included in the resolution:

First. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. is a railroad transportation company, having no power under the acts of Congress giving it the right to engage in the District of Columbia in real estate speculation. It has been said that this property was acquired by the railroad company for purposes of railroad improvement. If so, any idea of this kind was abandoned more than 11 years ago; and yet the railroad company has not disposed of any of its surplus holdings. If the court awards had been approved, this company would have secured profits over cost and 6 per cent interest of $590,810. The realization of such profits in this case would be an incentive to further real estate speculation. The demand of the times is that transportation companies be divorced from the coal business, from the business of real estate and railroad speculation, and, in fact, from every business except that of transportation. The provision to which I have referred would withdraw, at least to some extent, this incentive of large profits, while at the same time it would not impose loss upon the company on account of its real estate holdings in this District. The greater part of the railroad property in the area in question is held in the name of a holding company, the Real Estate & Improvement Co. This company is capitalized at only $2,500, and yet owns millions of dollars' worth of real estate in the District of Columbia.

Second. The railroad company is interested in millions of dollars' worth of real estate in the vicinity of the proposed park, the value of which will be materially enhanced by this improvement. It owns one-half of the stock of the Washington Terminal Co., which in turn owns the Union Station. In addition, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. has other holdings in this immediate vicinity. The effect of this legislation is to establish a large park in front of its property, which must, of course, be maintained at public expense. The consequential benefits to its direct and indirect holdings should certainly form a consideration for the sale of its property within the park area to the Government at reasonable prices, rather than at such prices as required the Executive disapproval.

Third. The railroad company is the chief beneficiary of all of this legislation. Let there be no misunderstanding about it. The awards of the court commission amounted to $3,204,434, of which $1,729,417, or 54 per cent, was for the benefit of the railroad company. The facts are that it has certain unprofitable holdings to the south and east of the Union Station. The effort has been to unload these holdings upon the United States at an enormous profit. The park scheme is merely a subterfuge. As the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and other gentlemen who are now Members of the House, said on June 23, 1910, the United States has no use whatever for this property, while the original and upkeep cost will be enormous. But if this unnecessary expenditure of millions of dollars of the people's money must be made at a time when the people have the right to demand economy in the administration of their affairs, we have the right to demand that the chief beneficiary of this proposed legislation should be subjected to some restrictions in its demands upon the money of the people. Is such a provision necessary? Read the answer to this question in every line of the recent court proceeding.

Fourth. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. has been the beneficiary of so much congressional legislation by which it has obtained special privileges and benefits that Congress has the right to demand some fairness at its hands. A few instances will be given.

By acts of May 9, 1828, and March 2, 1831, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. was given the right to extend its line of railroad into the District of Columbia and the city of Washington—along such public street or alley to such point or terminus within the said city as the said company shall find best calculated to promote the objects of said road.

No charge was made for this or any of the other privileges granted by these acts.

By act of March 3, 1835, this company was given the further right to construct its road through certain enumerated squares, after which follows this provision:

And the assent of Congress is hereby given to the construction of the said railroad through or over any of the said lots or parts of lots which are owned by the United States.

For this and other privileges conferred by this act no present or future charge was laid upon the company.

The Metropolitan Branch of this company was constructed within the District of Columbia and the city of Washington by authority of act of Congress of July 25, 1866, and act of the legislative body of the city of Washington of January 17, 1867. The congressional act authorized the construction of this branch within the District of Columbia and then—to such point or points, terminus or termini, as may be agreed upon between the said company and the corporation of Washington in respect of a road within the limits of Washington.

The act of the municipal legislature located this branch as follows:

Entering the said city at the intersection of its northern boundary and New York Avenue, crossing said avenue and passing through the northwest corner of square 710 to First Street east, thence along the center of that street to the present track of the Washington branch of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

This act also grants the company the right to construct and maintain tracks on D Street between North Capitol Street and

New Jersey Avenue and on North Capitol Street between D and C Streets.

By the Union Station legislation, being the acts of February 12, 1901, and February 28, 1903, Congress was even more liberal. These acts presented to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. and to the Washington Terminal Co. (which is owned one-half by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. and one-half by a subsidiary of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.) all of the public space now occupied by these companies with tracks, yards, and the Union Station. In addition, there was appropriated to these two railroad companies $3,000,000 of public money. In order to emphasize that these companies ought to be recipients of special privileges this legislation expressly exempts from taxation a considerable part of their tangible property within the District of Columbia.

Supplementary of such gifts the following appropriations have been made in recent years: Two million one hundred thousand dollars for the elimination of railroad grade crossings in Washington and in purchasing and improving the Plaza, which is an entrance to and a setting for the Union Station, and $500,000 for damages for change of grade of streets made necessary by the construction of the Union Station and terminals.

The sum and substance of this legislation is that Congress has presented to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. all of the public streets and spaces now and heretofore occupied by it and its subsidiary, the Washington Terminal Co., and has also appropriated millions of dollars out of the Treasury to it and for its benefit. For all of which no charge has been laid upon either company. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. has shown its appreciation of this lavish generosity on the part of Congress by consistently refusing to pay taxes on the public spaces occupied by it, although taxes are expressly laid thereon by the Union Station legislation. At the present time there are uncollected tax bills against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. and the Washington Terminal Co. amounting to about $55,000. The justice of this taxation is manifest. Here is certain valuable real estate withdrawn from public use and placed in the exclusive use and possession of these companies. They are deriving from it the same benefits as if it were owned in fee by them. Being devoted to a private use it becomes taxable property. The law which makes it taxable is consonant with the general rule that where public space is granted to persons or corporations for private use the property is brought within the taxing power.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. has not hesitated to avail itself of the valuable benefits granted to it by the Union Station legislation, although it has sought to avoid the very reasonable obligations imposed on it by this legislation. If we recall the many favors that Congress has showered upon it, the lack of public spirit thus manifested by this public-service company is most deplorable.

The legislative history of this company in the District of Columbia justifies me in saying that the time has come for Congress to demand that it should treat the Public Treasury fairly.

Fifth. There is nothing unfair in the agreement, which Mr. Tawney said had been made. Much of the railroad property has been in the actual, continuous use of this company during a long term of years as sites of the old passenger and freight depots, for yards and general trackage. Other portions of the property have been improved by buildings from which a rental income has been obtained. The agreement mentioned by Mr. Tawney would permit the company to obtain every dollar it has expended for the property, with 6 per cent interest thereon. When we recall that this company is without power to speculate in land and should not be encouraged to do so it is apparent that such an agreement is in accord with public policy.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. BARTON. Your bill, as I read it, contemplates a settlement with all the small property owners and leaves open the settlement with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It does, and they are in court asserting that they have rights, and it is not right for us to undertake to deal with them as long as they are in court, and this bill only permits the purchase from them when the sale comes voluntarily.

Mr. BARTON. Would you favor the Government acquiring a part of that property and leaving it an open question as to the rest of it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In order to punish an outrage I would, but I am not advocating that. In the report of the committee, which I drafted, I put in the right to acquire every piece of this property.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. POST. I wish to ask the gentleman what provision is made for taking care of property the owners of which are under disability, where they can not convey?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If anybody who is under disability owns property, the code of law for the District of Columbia provides how that sale may be made. If it is a lunatic, a married woman, or anybody under disability, there is provision in the District code as to how his or her property may be sold, and if it is offered at a price which the commission has a right to pay, then the purchase can be made.

Now, let me discuss for a few moments some of the awards to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. I find that on January 9, 1909, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad sold and conveyed square 678. The consideration was $450,000, or $2.42 per square foot. This property adjoins the Plaza and fronts 271 feet on Massachusetts Avenue.

Immediately across Massachusetts Avenue is square 680, all of which is unimproved. Part of this latter square was condemned at $5 per square foot, and other portions at $6.40, $7, and $11 per square foot. The average of the awards for this square was approximately $6.50 per square foot, or 2.68 times the sale price of the square directly across the street.

On March 13, 1909, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. parted with 9,772 square feet from square 681. The price paid was $1.50 per square foot. The lot so sold was taken from the most valuable portion of the square. The Baltimore & Ohio owns the remainder of the square, all of which is unimproved. For the remainder of this square this company was awarded an average of $4 per square foot, nearly three times the previous sale price of the most valuable portion of it.

On December 29, 1905, the Baltimore & Ohio sold 42,575 square feet of land from square 680 at $2.70 per square foot. It will be seen that this valuation is approximately the same as that placed by the same company in 1909 on square 678, located directly across the intervening street. Yet the average valuation of this square in the condemnation proceeding was approximately $6.50 per square foot of unimproved land, more than twice the preceding sale price.

In December, 1905, the Baltimore & Ohio sold 5,043 square feet from square 682 for $1.78 per square foot. This square was appraised at an average of $5.40 per square foot, three times the preceding sale price.

It will be noticed that these sales were made after the location of the Union Station improvement and the determination of the Plaza.

In April, 1902, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. offered, in writing, to sell square 681. I have already read from the letter of Mr. Hamilton, attorney for the Baltimore & Ohio, in which he stated that—

> A fair value to place upon this property would be $1.40 per square foot, which is something less than was paid by the company recently for properties in square 680 and square 678. At $1.40 per foot the price of this square is $235,478.60.

The award for this same square was $628,614, which was $393,135 more than the offer just referred to.

After the passage of the act of June 25, 1910, this company offered to sell square 682 at $4 per square foot. The award for this square was $5.40 per square foot. This difference amounted to $62,541. The profits that this company, a railroad transportation company, would have taken out of the Treasury on its real estate ventures in the District of Columbia, had these awards been approved, were enormous. The property originally cost the company $547,513. The awards were $1,729,417, or more than three times the cost price. The cost price with 6 per cent interest to the time the awards were made amounted to $1,138,607. The awards were therefore $590,810 more than the amount which Mr. Tawney said had been agreed upon as the sale price. While some of this property was acquired many years ago, most of it was purchased between 1898 and 1905.

It may occur to many of you that the commission created by this resolution can not now compel this company to accept original cost plus 6 per cent interest. But whether this agreement can be enforced or not, I submit that the House, having passed the original measure on the faith of the representation that such an agreement had been made, should do all within its power to secure its performance. If the property can not be purchased at the figures named, condemnation proceedings, it is true, may follow. But if excessive awards then be made, the President of the United States will, in my humble opinion, again take his position on the side of the people and protect them from the attempted fraud. Injustice is not made tolerable by repetition.

To my mind, the compelling thought in this matter is that, by our votes here, we should hold up the hands of the President. It does not answer to say that the commission proposed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds may not seek to overturn the action of the President. One member of that commission is already on record as being in disagreement with the President. What specious and plausible arguments will be made to the commission and what the effect will be I can not foretell, nor can you. I can only judge of the future by the past. If such a commission be created and should repudiate the action of the President, the blame for such extraordinary action will rest not only upon the commission, but also upon the Congress that regarded so lightly the official act of the greatest President since the War of the States.

It is easy for us to move along lines of least resistance. It is easy for us to shut our eyes and vote in favor of appropriations for every project that comes before Congress. By doing so we will receive the plaudits and aid of the beneficiaries of our votes. It is easy to refrain from asking questions as to the manner in which the money of the people is expended. But I have not been able to choose the easier course.

Now, please pardon me for trespassing upon your time a little further to call your attention to some of the other requirements which are contained in the amendment offered by the Committee on the District of Columbia. It has become an ascertained fact that during the last five years about 130 condemnation proceedings have been had in the District of Columbia, and in these proceedings the juries have been made up of less than 150 different individuals. That to me sounds nothing short of being an astounding state of affairs. The District Committee in its amendment recommends to this House that no man shall be permitted to serve as one of these commissioners to acquire this property who has served upon any one of these condemnation juries. That seems to me reasonable and fair.

The amendment further provides that nobody who owns land in this zone to be acquired by the United States shall be a member of this commission. It further provides that neither an officer nor a stockholder of any corporation which has a lien upon any property in that zone shall be one of those commissioners. It further provides that no man who has a lien on any of that property shall be one of these commissioners. It provides that no one shall be one of the commissioners if anyone of his family be interested. It further provides that no man who is a stockholder in the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad or in any subsidiary company shall be a member of this commission.

I say that this House ought to demand that this resolution become a law. The resolution further provides that neither an ex-Member of Congress nor a Member of Congress shall be a member of that commission. I say that no Member on the floor of this House who does his duty has time to devote to such a commission. It is said that these smaller property holders ought to have their money, and that they ought to have it quickly, and now that but little more than a quorum of this House is in town nobody should be spared from this House to give his time and attention to these condemnation awards. The business of this House should not be interfered with by imposing new duties upon Members.

When the original bill was up for consideration and it was proposed that the Vice President and the Speaker of the House be made members of the commission, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who was then, as now, an honored Member of this House, presented an able argument in an effort to show that no Member of Congress should be a member of this commission. He said that if this commission was made up of Members of Congress it would finally result in a "one-man" commission. The gentleman's words have become real prophecy; the commission did become a one-man commission. During the greater part of the time, or at least during the time when the effort was made to spend more than $3,200,000 of the public money, that commission was practically a one-man commission, the Vice President of the United States having died and Mr. Cannon having duties which required his almost undivided attention. I do not know Elliott Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. If I ever saw him, I did not know him. I do not speak of him with a desire to censure, but I do say, in a spirit of justice and in the cause of right, that a commission should not be composed of two Members of Congress and leave Elliott Woods the umpire between them. Should a difference arise between these two Members of Congress that some have suggested should be on the commission, and there should be a difference of opinion between them, then in steps Mr. Elliott Woods as umpire.

Now, let us look at the situation. Elliott Woods all along has been a member of this commission. He participated in the unauthorized and illegal proceedings.

We find him officially asking for the approval and payment of the excessive awards. Then we find standing out before us the courageous act of Woodrow Wilson refusing to approve what Elliott Woods approved. Notwithstanding these facts, I understand you will be asked to place Elliott Woods again on the commission with power to purchase any of the property, including that of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., at the figures fixed in the awards, or, in other words, to place him in a position where he may sit in judgment upon the action of the President. The plan is to put him back on this commission that he can override one of the great executive acts of the President of the United States. For myself, I declare that I never will be a willing instrument to any such legislation.

When you consider the enormity of what you may do, are you willing to go on record and say that you will put back on this commission the very man who approved the excessive awards and who made it necessary for the President to take the action he did?

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I have already taken too much of the time of the House, and with just a very few more remarks I shall conclude. I do not feel, however, that I should conclude without again inviting the attention of the membership of this House to the declaration made upon this floor when this bill was passed, a declaration which influenced its passage, a declaration made by a man who from his entire course in Congress stood unimpeached, even by innuendo, that there was an agreement with the railroad company that it would accept for its holdings original cost and 6 per cent interest.

Then we have the letter from Mr. George E. Hamilton, addressed to the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, between all the lines of which you can easily read, that they were willing to accept original cost and 6 per cent interest. And do not forget that when this commission could have bought a part of this Baltimore & Ohio Railroad land at a figure lower than it was finally appraised at they refused to do so. Then the members of the commission, who refused to buy it at the lesser figure, gave their support to the effort to collect the larger amount.

Then we have the fact that the President of the United States, after months and months of investigation and careful study, at last said to the individual owners of this land: "Regretting that my action will cause disappointment, I find your awards coupled with others that I can not approve."

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Chairman, acting for and on behalf of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST], I could say at the outset that there are many things upon which we can agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. The conditions as stated by him very fully cover the circumstances. We are confronted, however, with some peculiar situations which no legislation of this House can change or alter, if certain contentions are true. I want to refer for a moment to the proceedings had in the District of Columbia for the condemnation of the land. Proceedings were dismissed by order of the Attorney General, and from that dismissal the Baltimore & Ohio has, while not appealing, made a motion to strike off the entry of dismissal. If the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. is correct, as a legal proposition, and the proceedings are held to have been dismissed improperly, it means that the proceedings are reinstated, but in this condition: The act of Congress which provided for the acquisition of this land gave to the President of the United States after the report of the jury of condemnation was confirmed practically what might be still a veto power. Whether such power is exercisable or not, or whether the President of the United States could be attached to any judicial proceedings and made a part thereof, is a question, I presume, which will be argued in some other forum; but, however, I contend that the proceeding for the taking of the land being of a statutory character, that one whose land is taken is bound by all the terms and conditions of the statute under which the land is taken, and, therefore, the attaching as a condition precedent to the acquisition of the land the approval of the President of the United States means this: That unless such approval is given the proceedings are a nullity and no title whatever passes. I believe that in any proceedings for the acquisition of land by statute, as well as any right that we may seek to enforce, which is conferred by statute, we are bound to conform strictly to all of the requirements of the statute. So, should the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. be successful, or its holding company be successful, in having stricken from the record the entry of dismissal of the proceedings before the jury of view, we would then have those proceedings reinstated, but reinstated with the disapproval of the President of the United States a matter of record. The statute authorizing the proceedings required his approval before any payment could be made and any title pass, and the failure of his approval to appear affirmatively is the end of the proceedings in regard to the acquirement of the land of the Baltimore & Ohio.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cox). Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. LOGUE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman specify where the authority is which gives the President the power to negative these condemnation awards?

Mr. LOGUE. I can not offhand refer to the statute, but I will in a few moments.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit, I presume the authority is contained in the act of Congress which authorized the extension of the grounds for the Government Printing Office, although I would not agree that the President had any authority. That was authorized in 1890.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I presume it is under this clause contained in the original sundry civil act:

> If such condemnation proceedings are deemed necessary, they shall be in accordance with the provisions of act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, providing a site for the enlargement of the Governmnt Printing Office. (Stat. L., vol. 36, chap. 837.)

Mr. LOGUE. That is correct, and the statute referred to provided that after the jury had filed its report, and after the same had been confirmed, and after it was approved by the President of the United States, and after the payment of the amount of the award, then the title would pass to the United States. It did not provide for the taking of title by virtue of that statute, but it provided for the compliance with all these requirements first, and then after the payment of the money would the title pass. Therefore just stating that which to my mind is a collateral proposition and which will solve itself in the court proceedings I am going to treat this as if we had no such condition, because if it is to be argued out in the future as a legal proposition and successfully maintained that the entry of dismissal was a nullity, and that the act of Congress in adding the approval or disapproval of the President was ultra vires and of no effect or consequence then we are unfortunately caught by the award of that jury and bound thereby. However, the condition that confronted the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the reference to it of what is known as the Post resolution was this: Many individual property owners find themselves handicapped. Notice has been given of the acquisition of their land, loans secured upon the real estate have become due and are becoming due, and will not be renewed by any of the people who in the past have advanced the money.

We find that their properties can not be rented by reason of the uncertain tenure incident to a condition like this. We find that almost all are ready to accept the amount of the award made by the jury of view; and I am now speaking solely of the individuals, and leaving the Baltimore & Ohio Corporation out of it. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, after several meetings, referred this matter to a subcommittee, that has recommended to the House a substitute for the Post resolution, which provides for a commission to be appointed or a commission, rather, to be created, consisting of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the chairman of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and Mr. Elliott Woods, Superintendent of Capitol Building and Grounds. They would have authority to do what? To immediately settle with every person embraced in the condemnation proceedings at figures not exceeding the amount of the award made by the jury of view. So that the individual property owner, harassed, damaged, annoyed, and fearing future injury by delay, could, the day after the passage of this resolution, tender a deed to the United States Government, receive his money, and be at an end of his trouble and the Government in full possession of the title. That, of course, embraces the right and power of that commission, if it desired, to go to the Baltimore & Ohio or its holding company and offer the amount of money specified in the award, and purchase from them at the figures that the jury awarded. But I am firmly of the opinion that no commission constituted as this is, composed of the chairman of a great committee of this House and the chairman of a great committee of the Senate, would for one moment fly in the face of the disapproval of the President of the United States, who specifically found these awards to be in excess of the real value of the property. I am equally well satisfied that no commission constituted as this is will, in the face of the statements that have been read by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] as to the price that has been fixed on this property by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., or its holding company, offer a penny in excess of such figures as are manifested by the letter of counsel.

I would accept the letter of Mr. Hamilton as being conclusive and binding upon me were I a member of this commission as being the statement of the owner himself, because I believe where counsel engaged in matters of this sort state values they do not do it without the necessary authority.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOGUE. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know what the letter contained on the proposition?

Mr. LOGUE. The one just read by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know anything about that; but I am talking about the letter Mr. Hamilton wrote stating in effect that they would be willing to sell the property for the original cost, the cost of filling in the ground, the amount of taxes that have been paid from the time the land was acquired, and 6 per cent interest on the original cost, and I have understood, though I do not know, that this letter was in the possession of the commission for quite a while, and while it was in their possession they endeavored to ascertain——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. After I have completed the sentence——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I take it for granted the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was not in the House when I read the letter of Mr. Hamilton.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I was not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The reporter now has it for the purpose of copying it, and I think the gentleman was not here.

Mr. MANN. The gentlemen are referring to two different letters.

Mr. LOGUE. There were two different letters, I believe.

Mr. MADDEN. The letter I have reference to, although I have never seen it, and I do not know anything about its contents except what I have heard, I believe was in the possession of the commission for some time; and perhaps while in possession of the commission during the period of nearly two years the commission endeavored to ascertain from Mr. Hamilton, on behalf of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, what the cost of filling in this ground was, what the amount of taxes would be on it for that period of their ownership; and I think they were unable to ascertain that, but I was rather of the opinion we might be getting a wrong impression if it was thought that the statement of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad attorney was to the effect that they would take the original purchase price and 6 per cent interest, and I wanted to know whether the gentleman understood that, and whether he could enlighten the House in reference to it.

Mr. LOGUE. I can not enlighten the House; but I understood by the effect of the question put by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that, in addition to merely receiving the value of the land plus 6 per cent, there are other conditions to be performed by the Government, to wit, cost and expense of the Baltimore & Ohio filling in the ground, taxes to be paid, so that it was not merely a matter of computation of a sum with interest for a specific period, but it was an ascertainment of other outlays that had been made. But what I wanted to convey was the thought that that commission—and I care not in what manner it is or how composed—would not jump over the award of any jury, in view of the statements made here to-day, of hundreds of thousands of dollars in excess of the actual value of the land having been fixed by the award; that they would not jump over and accept that award in view of the information given here to-day as to what was the real value of the property, as to the basis upon which they could figure out what the Baltimore & Ohio was willing to take. But the main point, to my mind, is this: Suppose that a commission was constituted well safeguarding the interests of the Government, I do not believe that that commission, constituted as it has been by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the substitute it offered, will fly in the face of a public disapproval of the figures of a jury——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOGUE. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand this proposition, the appraisement has been gone over by the Attorney General?

Mr. LOGUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. What objection could there be for substituting the Attorney General and some Cabinet officer, such as the Secretary of Commerce, in place of the chairmen of the respective Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds to act in conjunction with the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds and pass on this question? They have gone over it. The distinguished chairmen of the House committee and the Senate committee have had no knowledge whatsoever of the appraisal or the facts connected with it.

Mr. LOGUE. Personally, as regards that, of course—and when I say personally I mean simply as an individual member of that committee—I would have no objection; but we have carefully considered in committee various public officials, heads of departments, the Executive of the United States, acting in conjunction with these and thoroughly conversant with the reports which they had received, without undertaking to disapprove of any of the officials of whom the gentleman has spoken; but in taking the chairman of the Senate committee and the House committee, we would take two gentlemen who had become conversant by reason of this very matter, having had it before their respective committees, and inasmuch as the disapproval of the President of the United States gives specific information as to what awards were thought excessive and the fact that individual owners be willing to accept their figures and the figures of the jury, we felt satisfied that that would be a proper make-up of the commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman maintain that the distinguished chairmen of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds are conversant with the value of that property which has been condemned?

Mr. LOGUE. The wording of all the resolutions undertakes to recognize that the awards made by the jury were reasonable and just awards, except the award made to the Baltimore & Ohio Railway.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Johnson resolution does not except that at all; it is founded upon an entirely different predication.

Mr. LOGUE. It excepts that; I do not think we differ on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Johnson resolution provides for an investigation de novo upon the valuation of these tracts.

Mr. LOGUE. While it may so state, I recall that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], in presenting the proposition on the floor, said that his commission would give immediate opportunity for prompt payment to the several people who are willing to accept the amount of the previous award.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will pardon an interruption just there, the resolution reported out of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman provides that when the owners of the property have agreed with the commission upon a sale price and presented deeds which the Attorney General says conveys the unencumbered fee simple title, then the President shall pay. The proposition which comes from the committee of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE] is a member provides for the purchase of merely a commercial title.

Mr. LOGUE. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A marketable title.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOGUE. I will.

Mr. POST. I want to answer for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE]. The United States district attorney for the District here had this matter under consideration; and if the resolution is passed, either the one which is proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky or the one proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, they could resort to the same source. The Attorney General himself would have no knowledge of this. It would be the district attorney, and the committee could apply to him for any information.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, the attorney who was appointed by the Government was the attorney connected with the Department of Justice who has jurisdiction in condemnation proceedings here in the District?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, the Attorney General has passed upon this matter at the request of the President of the United States, and why not allow him and another member of the Cabinet to act as advisers, in conjunction with the Superintendent of the Capitol, in passing upon whether these awards are right or proper or exorbitant or not?

Mr. POST. The answer to that is that any committee that Congress could appoint for that purpose might have that same information.

Mr. BURNETT. May I answer the gentleman's question? Did the gentleman ask in regard to a suggestion that the Attorney General and some other member of the Cabinet should be a member of the commission?

Mr STAFFORD. My idea was to substitute, in place of the chairmen of the respective committees, a Cabinet officer. One of the Cabinet officers is already acquainted with this question. The respective chairmen have no knowledge of the valuation of that property, but we have the Attorney General, who has passed upon it, at the suggestion of the President, and the Secretary of Commerce is a good business man.

Mr. MANN. May I ask my friend why a former Member of the House would know more about the extension of the Capitol buildings and grounds than a present Member of the House? I am sure he has not had time since he has filled the position of Secretary of Commerce to get acquainted with the subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. He is reputed as a good business man.

Mr. MANN. We are all business men.

Mr. STAFFORD. We know that 90 per cent of the Members of this House are not business men.

Mr. BURNETT. I had a talk with the Attorney General about this. I was chairman of the subcommittee that looked into this, and the Attorney General said, "Do not have any member of the Cabinet. Cabinet officers have too much to do and too many other responsibilities; and whatever else you do, do not name a member of the Cabinet."

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman recognize also that Members of Congress have more than they can generally attend to without taking upon themselves extra outside work?

Mr. BURNETT. I want to say that I was a member of the Public Buildings Committee, and in the absence of the chairman of the committee I acted as chairman when this commission was suggested, and the idea of the committee, of these gentlemen who are having to do every day with appropriations for public buildings, was that this very matter itself, having been referred to the Public Buildings Commission, they would probably be more capable of doing that very thing, and feel more pride in looking after it, than any other Member of Congress or any Cabinet officer would have. And that is a practical proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. While we all agree that members of the Cabinet have as much as they possibly can attend to and have very large additional burdens put upon them, we know that if we would impose upon them this additional duty they would attend to it promptly and efficiently.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to say further to the gentleman that there is a commission provided for by the Congress, and that commission is composed in part of the chairmen of the Public Buildings Committees of the House and Senate. They have no doubt done more work than anyone else on the commission, and I say this without reflection on any other member of the commission. They have had a great deal of detail work. If the gentleman will read the report, he will see that somebody has been giving it careful, conscientious, and earnest attention.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as these proceedings are not new, inasmuch as the commission appointed is not asked to go out and acquire a tract that has not been considered, inasmuch as this commission will have testimony which has been taken under oath, and will have the report of the jury of view and the opinion of the Attorney General, it will not be much more than a culling committee of three, to quickly pick out those pieces of land where the price is looked upon as reasonable by both the Government in the past and the property owners who did not appeal, and report a quick settlement to relieve the distress that is incident to the matter being tied up.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOGUE. I will.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Is it generally taken for granted that the principle on which the valuation of the individual property owner's property is based is different from that on which the valuation of the property of the railroad is based?

Mr. LOGUE. Inasmuch as we are met by practically an approval of the awards made to the individuals and disapproval of the awards made to the corporation, that condition must necessarily exist.

Mr. BARTON. Are you quite sure that the President approved of all the local or small holdings?

Mr. LOGUE. That I would not undertake to say, but the principal complaint is directed toward the awards made to the Baltimore & Ohio and its holding company.

Now, then, with the commission in possession of these facts, the power conferred under the substitute resolution reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is as follows, namely, to make immediate settlement with the owners at prices not exceeding the amount of the award of the jury of view, and payment thereof to be made upon their conveying to the United States Government a good and marketable title, clear of all encumbrances.

It was stated a few moments ago—and questioned—whether that was not merely a commercial title. But I think it is universally accepted that the words "good and marketable, and clear of all incumberance" pass practically the best and the highest title that can be conveyed to land. The phrase is looked upon in the State that I in part represent as being the words which, when embodied in an agreement of sale, put the vendor to a strict compliance to relieve the title of any possible flaw, easement, charge, or lien and convey a title that would be indefeasible.

We therefore say the settlement is to be made at once with those you can settle with, where the prices are fair and equitable, but for those which are not, and in cases where you can not agree—where the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. will not concede, or any other holding company refuses to come down to statements that practically in the past have been used by them to fix the value, and which therefore should estop them from the assertion of any higher claim—to do what? To apply for the appointment of a jury of view, to whom will be referred the disputed claims and who shall make an award, which award, after being confirmed by the court as to regularity and the correctness of the proceedings, shall be valid and binding unless disapproved of by the President of the United States within 60 days of the date of the filing of that report, which disapproval must be evidenced in writing, filed in the proceedings.

We have so worded that as to provide that the disapproval of the President shall not affect the entire report, and that we shall not again be confronted with the condition of its being held by the opinion of the Attorney General that the report was an entirety, and that the disapproval of a single item of the award in that report carried the disapproval of the entire report. We have set forth in our resolution the statement that the disapproval of the President of the United States shall affect only the particular item or items to which he asserts his disapproval, but that the report in all other particulars shall be binding and conclusive.

We have not therefore left this open for it to be haphazardly considered by any commission. We have not left it open that an award of a jury in the future may be conclusive and binding, even if you do suffer in the District of Columbia as we suffer in other portions of the United States by gentlemen ready to volunteer their services at all times for juries of view or juries in condemnation proceedings, and where we find that the selection very seldom goes out of a decidedly limited circle. We have guarded that, because we have added to it the further condition that the President of the United States has the right to disapprove.

The resolution as reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia does what? It simply provides for the employment of three commissioners by the President of the United States to purchase such property as can be purchased at this time at figures not exceeding those set forth in the report of the jury of view.

I am taking this as a broad proposition, and I do not purpose to answer or attempt to answer statements made as to the quantum of land held by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. or its holding company. I consider that immaterial, because I consider that the proper commission will handle the question without regard as to who are the owners. But we are confronted with the fact that Congress in the past has made an appropriation for a great enterprise. True, it may be criticized at this time. True, if put over to gentlemen who now compose the House, it might not be decided upon at present as it was decided upon in the past. But it is an undertaking that means a great development for the city of Washington, and an undertaking that is safeguarded so that the Government will not pay a penny more than it should pay, and an undertaking that should be carried on to its completion and to its end.

I do not believe it is to the best interests of the District of Columbia, nor to the best interests of the great development plans that are under way in the District of Columbia, nor to the best interests of the United States, that the authority to take land here should be an authority limited to particular spots, and that we would find that the Government is not and could not become the owner of all the land embraced within the present plan of development.

If we pass the resolution as it comes from the Committee on the District of Columbia we merely provide for the purchase of some of the land and leave the rest of the land to be disposed of in the future. The resolution as coming from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds provides for both. It provides for the relief of the individual property owner who may be to-day suffering. It provides as well for the acquisition on the part of the Government of all the land embraced in the scheme known as the Plaza development.

So I contend that the committee's report, or the committee's substitute as reported to the House, takes up the matter in its entirety, and at the proper time I shall offer it as an amendment to the resolution which has been offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

I am advised that the record of past proceedings shows that Members of Congress and public officials are competent to deal with great undertakings. I find upon a brief examination that the condemnation of land for the site of the Government Printing Office was intrusted to a commission composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Public Printer, and the Architect of the Capitol, who were directed to acquire the land.

The act of 1904, providing for a site for the Senate Office Building, created a commission to acquire the ground composed of Senators CULLOM, GALLINGER, and COCKRELL.

The act passed in 1908, providing for the acquisition of five squares of ground south of Pennsylvania Avenue, for offices for the State Department and Departments of Justice, Commerce, and Labor, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire the ground.

The original act to authorize the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds created a commission to acquire the land required composed of the Speaker of the House, the Vice President, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds.

I am not willing to consider that there is any impediment incident to a membership in the House. I am free to state that I believe that a Member of the House, placed in a position of responsibility, being called upon to exercise his judgment in the acquisition and purchase of land and the determination of the price he will pay therefor, stands as a public character who will perform that duty equally as well, if not better, than the private commissioner, taken from private life, who is in no way hereafter answerable to the public. I view it that a Member of the House will be equally careful, if not more careful, in the exercise of an extra duty thrown upon him than will the individual brought from private life and just commissioned for that particular act. And the same applies to the Member of the Senate. I believe that the commissioners, as designated in the resolution coming from the committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, occupy a position that assures us of the most careful thought and consideration of this entire proposition.

The words of the gentleman from Kentucky have been well chosen. The attention of the membership of this House has been called to the fact that an apparent injustice was being done to the Government in a report heretofore made, and that the heroism and devotion to public duty on the part of the President of the United States in his disapproval prevented that injustice from being carried into effect. I firmly believe that the same spirit will pervade the gentlemen who are designated under the House resolution. I am satisfied that careful thought and consideration will be given by them, and that in the adoption of the resolution that I shall offer subsequently as an amendment we will close up the matter in its entirety.

No one holds a brief here for any corporate interest or any interest counter to the welfare of our Government. We are moved in the thought that our plan is expeditious, that it is simple, that it means relief to the individuals who are suffering, that it means the Government can acquire a part of this land at once at an equitable and proper price that has been approved by the President of the United States, ratified by the Congress, and is the work of a jury, before whom evidence was adduced as to value. We believe that as to the remaining part we safeguard against the attempt at a grab by limiting the power of the commission to acquisition within particular figures, those figures being the reports heretofore made; and with the notice served to-day, I am satisfied that no member of that commission will have the hardihood to approach the figures of the report made in the cases that were the subject of criticism.

Then we provide for the completion of the plan, the ending of the undertaking, by making it possible for this Congress to provide, after settlement with the individuals, for condemnation proceedings to acquire the rest of the land, and then we further safeguard it by attaching to those condemnation proceedings the necessity for the approval of the President of the United States, and his disapproval ending it.

I think by this means we have surrounded it with all the terms and conditions that will make it an expeditious and at the same time a cautious plan, and we have placed it where it will be safeguarded by the honorable gentlemen to whom it will be intrusted. And even should they be forgetful or should they be careless or should they be negligent, we will have that same heroic devotion to public duty on the part of the President that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] called attention to, and it will be exercised again; that is, his veto to nullify an excessive award and thereby prevent the United States Government paying a cent more than it should. [Applause.]

PLAZA AWARDS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I find myself in an anomalous situation. I am for House joint resolution 129, coming from the District Committee, but I am more for House joint resolution 269, which comes from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

To my mind House joint resolution 129 is not broad enough. It does not take in the whole situation.

The extension of the Capitol Grounds for the purpose of beautifying them originated in 1910, and the proposed plan contemplated an entire scheme. Under the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] the commission which it creates would simply be authorized to purchase such property as the property owners might offer for sale and upon which they might agree as to the price. It was never contemplated by Congress, in the original declaration and intention to acquire this property for the purposes stipulated, that isolated pieces of property should be acquired. It was contemplated that all of the nine and one-half squares mentioned in the original law should be bought and each and every parcel in those squares obtained for this purpose. Now, under the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], as I said a moment ago, you would procure a piece of property here and one over there, and the object sought to be accomplished would not be obtained.

Under resolution 269 a complete plan for the entire acquisition of all the property is proposed.

There is still another objection to the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. It vests in the President the right to appoint a commission of three members, and curtails his power in that direction. In that respect it differs from the acquisition of any public ground that I have been able to discover. Whenever Congress has heretofore created a commission and delegated to it the power to acquire property for the Government, it has always intrusted it in the hands of Members of Congress or the heads of departments. In this case I do not see any reason for violating the rule that Congress has always followed in that respect.

There is another serious objection to House joint resolution 129. It vests in the President the veto power. It gives the President the same discretion that he exercised in the former condemnation proceedings. I expect to dwell upon that question. It treats of the legal aspects of the case. I have gone over this carefully, and I want to give some history in relation to it.

First, I want to treat of House joint resolution 269. Mr. Chairman, House joint resolution 269, Union Calendar No. 247, makes provision for a commission to acquire land to extend the Capitol Grounds north to the Union Station Plaza, not heretofore obtained by the Government for that purpose. It creates a commission composed of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House, and authorized this commission to acquire by purchase, if possible, the land on behalf of the United States for that purpose; if unable to purchase any or all of such lands, then jurisdiction is conferred upon the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia at the instigation of the committee to condemn such lands as the commission may not be able to purchase. All the machinery necessary for the exercise of the right of eminent domain by the Government in this respect is fully provided for in the joint resolution.

May 12, 1909, Senator Wetmore introduced a bill for the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds. This bill, among other things, provided:

That for the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds, to provide a dignified and adequate approach to the Capitol, and to construct a direct avenue of about 150 feet in width from the junction of Pennsylvania Avenue and First Street NW. to the Union Station Plaza, the center line of said avenue to be located on the axis of the Peace Monument and the site of the westerly fountain in said Plaza, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, all of squares Nos. 632, 633, 634, 680, 681, 684, 685, 721, 722, and 723, in the city of Washington, D. C.

The commission afterwards, acting under authority conferred by another act of Congress—the act really vital—left out that portion of the block in which the Maltby Building is situated. The bill of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and the resolution 269 also omit that. The resolution of Mr. JOHNSON includes the whole of square 721.

In the meantime, after the enactment of the law authorizing the acquisition of this, California Street was extended afterwards to the Union Station grounds, and all the lots south of that are left out of resolution 269. The Johnson resolution includes the whole of that.

In making the appraisals in condemnation proceedings the commissioners appointed to appraise the property left that out. So that under resolution 269 it is only contemplated taking that portion of square 721 which lies south of California Street.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POST. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Then that which is embraced in the holding of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad would not be embraced in resolution 269, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. POST. No, sir; it would not.

Now, the sundry civil act of June, 1910, provided—and this is the law under which the commission was created and under which it operated in these awards—it is hereby declared—Thirty-sixth Statutes, page 738—to be the purpose of Congress to ultimately acquire all of square 632; and then it enumerates the squares I have read and included in the original Wetmore bill. I call attention of the committee that the language of the original act was that "it is hereby declared to be the purpose of Congress to ultimately acquire all of these squares." That is important, because in the exercise of the high power of eminent domain it always rests with the sovereign power to declare that intention. It is true in many of the States that power is sometimes delegated—delegated to railroad companies, to municipalities—but in this instance I want to impress on the committee that Congress itself declared the intention to acquire this property. I do that because I take issue with the President and his advisers on that proposition. I maintain that the President had no veto power, because Congress itself had declared its intention to acquire this property; but I will treat of that later on.

The sundry civil appropriation act of June 25, 1910, Thirty-sixth Statutes, page 738, provides:

It is hereby declared to be the purpose of Congress to ultimately acquire all of squares Nos. 632, 633, 634, 680, 682, 683, 684, 385, 721, 722, 723, in the city of Washington, D. C., for the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds and for the construction of a direct avenue of about 150 feet in width from the junction of Pennsylvania Avenue and First Street NW. to the Union Station Plaza, the center line of said avenue to be located on the axis of the Peace Monument and the site of the westerly fountain in said plaza. The Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Grounds are hereby authorized and directed to acquire said premises by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, and to expend for that purpose not more than $500,000 in any one fiscal year, commencing with the year 1911, and the persons authorized to acquire such property shall annually, within said limit, purchase whatever of said property is in their judgment offered at the lowest prices relative to its actual value, provided they shall not purchase any property at above its fair actual value. If in any year there should not be offered property substantially up to said sum of $500,000 at its fair value or less, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Grounds are authorized to institute condemnation proceedings in order to secure any or all of the land herein authorized to be acquired, but for not to exceed what they estimate to be $500,000 worth in any one fiscal year. If such condemnation proceedings are deemed necessary, they shall be in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, providing a site for the enlargement of the Government Printing Office (Stat. L., vol. 26, ch. 837). For the execution of the foregoing, $500,000.

It will be noticed that under this act if the commissioners could not purchase the property they were instructed to acquire, then they were authorized to commence condemnation proceedings, and these proceedings were to be had, and the method was to be the same as that under the act of 1890 for the extension of the ground for the public printing building.

Now, in that act it did provide that after the commission had selected the site, after the commission had appraised that site, then the President of the United States could approve or disapprove of the location and the value placed upon it by the commission.

At the time of the passage of this act Vice President James S. Sherman, Speaker Joseph G. Cannon, and Mr. Elliott Woods constituted the commission for the acquisition of this property.

The sundry civil appropriation act of March 4, 1911 (36 Stats., p. 414), provides:

That the persons designated in said act to acquire the land described therein for the purpose stated shall continue to serve under said law and to exercise all the powers and duties conferred thereby in every particular and as fully, notwithstanding either or any of them may have ceased by operation of law to occupy the office held at the time of the passage of the said sundry civil act, and the said persons acting under said sundry civil act shall constitute and be known as a commission, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum and be competent to transact the duties devolving on them.

It will be seen by this act, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Cannon may have gone out of Congress and that Vice President Sherman may have died, although he had not at that time, it created the same individuals as this commission and authorized their continuance of this work.

In view of the fact that Vice President Sherman is deceased and ex-Speaker Cannon is absent from the Capital it was thought expedient to create a new commission. A history of the proceedings of the commission created by act of June 25, 1910, is pertinent to a correct understanding of the necessity of the pending resolution. It will be noted that the act authorized the commission to purchase the land for the use of the United States Government. Under this authority the commission on the 8th day of July, 1910, advertised for sealed bids for the sale to the Government of the lands within the area to be acquired. In addition to the advertisement it caused notices to be given to the various property owners or their agents so far as they could be ascertained. On the 10th day of August, 1910, the bids received were publicly opened, there being within the area to be acquired about 462 parcels of land. Of this number the owners only of 272 parcels, or about 59 per cent and representing 71 per cent of the entire area, filed bids with the commission. After a careful consideration of all the bids submitted the commission submitted them to the Attorney General of the United States, and on the 14th day of October, 1910, the Acting Attorney General recommended that they be rejected and that it would be to the interest of the Government to acquire title through condemnation proceedings.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POST. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that the gentleman from Ohio is going to take up the question of the authority of the President to reject these bids?

Mr. POST. Yes. On May 9, 1911, acting upon the advice of the Attorney General's Office, the commission determined to reject all bids submitted, and requested the Attorney General to institute condemnation proceedings. On August 13, 1911, proceedings were commenced in condemnation to acquire squares numbered 634, and 685, these two squares being situated immediately north of the Capitol Grounds and being two squares where the buildings have recently been demolished and removed. These proceedings were concluded on April 22, 1912. The aggregate amount of the awards granted to the property owners by the court commissioners for the two squares was $1,119,035.50, and were approved by the commission on May 18, 1912, and payment ordered to be made to the various property owners. These two squares contained 99 parcels of land, and were subsequently paid for and possession taken by the Government. At the instigation of the commission condemnation proceedings as to squares 632, 680, 681, 682, 683, and 684, 721, 722, and 723, and that part of square 633 lying east of Arthur Place, were commenced on September 16, 1912, and concluded on January 29, 1913; that part of square 633 lying west of Arthur Place the commission did not deem essentially necessary, and it was not embraced in the condemnation proceedings. The awards included about 359 parcels, the total appraisement aggregating $3,204,434.78. On February 6, 1913, the Attorney General having reported to the commission that he had given careful consideration to the awards made for each parcel of land and that he believed the same to be reasonable, and having advised that the Government accept each and every award, the commission, then consisting of Mr. Cannon and Mr. Wood, instructed the Attorney General to take the necessary steps to secure the confirmation of the various awards by the court. On the 29th day of January, 1913, the court by an entry duly recorded, approved and confirmed the assessments and awards made by condemnation proceedings.

The appropriations made under the provision of the act of June 25, 1910, are:

Sundry civil act of June 25, 1910	$500,000
Sundry civil act of Mar. 4, 1911	500,000
Sundry civil act of Aug. 24, 1912	500,000

Of these three appropriations there has been expended in the condemnation of squares 634 and 685, $1,119,035.50 and in advertising and miscellaneous expenses $502.07, making a total of $1,119,537.57, leaving an unexpended balance of $380,462.43.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POST. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. It may be that the gentleman from Ohio can inform the committee as to the amount provided in the Senate amendment to the sundry civil bill before the amendment of the House conferees was adopted. The Senate amendment provided for a direct purchase, I think, in the aggregate amount of three million and a half dollars.

Mr. POST. No; it provided that there should be an appropriation each year of $500,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was not the original amendment. When the sundry civil bill passed the House it contained no provision for the purchase of the Plaza. There was an amendment put in in the Senate authorizing a direct purchase of the property and appropriating three and a half million dollars.

Mr. POST. Two million eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. What was the total amount?

Mr. POST. Three million dollars; but it included an unappropriated balance after paying for these two squares. Upon recommendation of the commission there was included in the sundry civil bill passed by Congress March, 1913, an appropriation of $2,823,972.35 to pay the costs of these condemnation proceedings and the awards made by the court commission, this sum, together with the unexpended balance of $380,462.43, being sufficient for that purpose. This sundry civil bill was vetoed by President Taft, but for reasons entirely separate and distinct from the condemnation proceedings. This appropriation of $2,823,972.35 was carried in the sundry civil bill approved June 23, 1913, as follows:

To complete the acquisition of squares numbered 632, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 721, 722, 723, and all that part of square numbered 633 lying east of Arthur Place, provided for by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes," the sum necessary, in addition to sums already appropriated, to pay the amounts awarded by court commission under the statute, $2,823,972.35.

The amount of this appropriation was obtained by subtracting from the aggregate appraisement of all the lots sought to be acquired $3,204,434.78, the unexpended balance of the three prior appropriations being $380,462.43. By act of June 25, 1910, should condemnation proceedings become necessary, the commissioners were authorized to proceed under the act of Congress (Stat. L., vol. 26, ch. 837, p. 412) providing a site for the enlargement of the Government Printing Office. This act contains a provision that when such report—report of the commissioners in condemnation—shall have been confirmed by the court, the President of the United States shall, if he thinks the public interest requires it, cause payment to be made to respective persons entitled according to the statement of the court, and so forth.

The proceedings in condemnation remained in this condition until March 18, 1914, when the President assuming to act under the above provision filed in the District Court in said cause the following instrument in writing:

Whereas under an act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, and acts supplementary thereto, proceedings have been instituted on behalf of the United States in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, being District court cause No. 1046, to acquire by condemnation in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, the title to the real estate in the city of Washington described as squares 632, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 721, 723, and all that part of square 633 lying east of Arthur Place, for the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds; and

Whereas the commissioners appointed by the court in said proceedings have appraised the value of the said real estate at the sum of $3,204,434.78, which appraisement was confirmed by said court on the 24th day of February, 1913: Now, therefore,

I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, by virtue of the authority vested in me by law, do hereby declare that the public interest requires that said real estate shall not be acquired by the United States for the sum fixed in said appraisement as confirmed by the court, and I accordingly direct that the said proceedings to condemn said lands to the use of the United States be dismissed.

A copy of this order may, if necessary, be filed in said cause, and spread upon the minutes of said Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

WOODROW WILSON, President.

Signed in duplicate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POST. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Did I understand the gentleman correctly to say that the measure which he is advocating does not include the acquirement of the northern portion of square 721?

Mr. POST. It does not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I find on page 7 of the measure which the gentleman is advocating these words:

Whereas proceedings have been had in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for the condemnation of certain real estate desired by the Government for the extension of the Capitol Grounds, which said land is fully described in said proceedings.

Mr. POST. That does not cover square 721.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And over on page 9 of the same measure, in lines 3, 4, and 5, the following language:

And they are hereby appointed a commission for the purpose of acquiring said tracts or parcels of land.

Mr. POST. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman please tell me where the northern portion of square 721 is left out in the measure that he is advocating?

Mr. POST. It was left out in the proceedings that were held in the District court, and this simply covers the property that was included in those proceedings.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think he is mistaken?

Mr. POST. Oh, no; I think I am absolutely correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman does not, however, set out in the measure that he is advocating any of this property by numbering the squares?

Mr. POST. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is just referred to as property described in the original proceedings?

Mr. POST. The property which was included in the condemnation proceedings; and if the gentleman will look at House Document 1392, he will find that I am correct. It does not include the northern half of 721. They were expressly left out by lot numbers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will pardon another interruption, I have before me the report of the commission, and on page 26 thereof, under the subtitle of schedule as to square 721, I would be glad if the gentleman would show, if he can, where the northern portion of that square is not included?

Mr. POST. If the gentleman will turn to page 27 of that report, he will find, in the third paragraph, parcels numbered 18, 19, 20, and on up to 42, inclusive, and it specifically states that these parcels are not to be taken in these proceedings, and are therefore not appraised by the commission. Those lots lie directly east of the station, in the vacant ground there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman will find on investigation that those are the lands taken by the Union Station.

Mr. POST. Oh, no; my information is the other way, and I think the gentleman is absolutely mistaken about that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think not, and I think the gentleman, on investigation, will find that I am correct about it.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the language that was used by the President in the paper which he filed in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. He says there:

* * * do hereby declare that the public interest requires that said real estate shall not be acquired by the United States for the sum fixed in said appraisement as confirmed by the court. * * *

He does not undertake to controvert the authority that Congress itself had formally expressed its intention in the original act. In other words, he does not veto the express statement that Congress had theretofore made of its intention to acquire this property. He says that the public interest does not require the acquisition of this property at the price fixed in the appraisement. He further says that a copy of this order may, if necessary, be filed in said case and spread upon the minutes of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

This paper was filed on the 4th day of April, 1914.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POST. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, if I understand the gentleman's contention, it is that the act authorizing the acquisition of this Plaza ground did not vest in the President any authority to negative an award?

Mr. POST. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the statement in that act stating that if condemnation proceedings are resorted to they should be in consonance with the act providing for the enlargement of the Government Printing Office was merely directory as to the proceedings, and did not vest any authority in the President to negative the express purpose of Congress as declared in that act for the acquisition of this Plaza ground.

Mr. POST. The gentleman has stated my position exactly.

On the 4th of April, 1914, the United States atttorney for the District of Columbia directed the clerk of the court to discontinue and dismiss the proceedings, and the clerk of the court on the same day made an entry discontinuing and dismissing the proceedings. To this entry of dismissal the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. filed a motion to strike from the files the paper filed by the United States attorney for the District of Columbia on April 4, 1914, and to expunge from the record the entry discontinuing and dismissing the proceeding.

It will be noted that by the original act of June 25, 1910, the commission created by that act is limited to the acquisition of property in value not in excess of $500,000; that, notwithstanding this limitation upon the power of the commission, upon the advice of the Department of Justice, the proceeding to condemn the whole of the property was commenced on September 16, 1912, and concluded on January 29, 1913. The court entered its judgment, approved and ratified and in all things confirmed the assessments and awards made by the condemnation commission. This action on the part of the commission was no doubt premature, but the Congress having, in the sundry civil bill of March, 1913, and of June 23, 1913, appropriated funds sufficient to pay these awards, any irregularity in this record was certainly cured, so far as any objections might be made on the part of the United States Government. The judgment is certainly binding upon the property owners, because there can be no doubt but that the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter, and the property owners should have taken advantage of any irregularity in the proceeding.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me an interruption, I will say that under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I will insert in the RECORD an argument controverting the position which the gentleman has taken, and I think successfully controverting it.

Mr. POST. Mr Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman has that opinion of what he may accomplish. Conceding that under the act of 1890 the President was vested with the power to approve or disapprove, I desire to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that after the court had reviewed and confirmed the awards, Congress itself by the sundry civil act which President Taft disapproved in March, 1913, recognized the awards, and the sundry civil bill of June, 1913, contained an appropriation to pay the exact amount of these awards, and President Wilson signed that bill and approved of the act of Congress making payment for those awards; and if he had any authority under the act of 1890 to veto or disapprove or disaffirm these awards, by his approving the appropriation that was made by Congress he thereby exercised his right, if he had one, although I do not concede that he had any.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman's contention then is that after having approved the bill making the appropriation for the payment of this money it was beyond the power of the President to direct that no payment be made?

Mr. POST. Yes; because he had approved what Congress had done, and the act expressly stipulated that it was to pay the awards of this court commission, and he approved that act.

Mr. MADDEN. And the gentleman's contention is that he has no further right?

Mr. POST. None, whatever.

Mr. PLATT. That is right.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POST. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. In regard to the $500,000 appropriation per annum, does not the gentleman think that this subsequent appropriation of $2,800,000 was a legislative ratification or approval of the previous act?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman will entertain a different opinion——

Mr. POST. Here is my friend from Kentucky——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky (continuing). When he sees the argument I shall insert in the RECORD as a part of the speech I made to-day.

Mr. POST. Well, I have given this pretty close study, and it will take considerable argument to convince me I am wrong. Mr. JOHNSON objects to the proceeding in this case because, he says, the court confirmed these awards four days before the expiration of the 30 days. Now, a long time elapsed, from March 13 until June 13, when Congress itself approved and confirmed these awards by making an appropriation to pay them and directing this commission to pay them.

Some other interesting legal questions are involved in a consideration of the question:

First. Did the President of the United States have any authority to intervene?

Second. Is the judgment in the condemnation proceedings final as between the property holders and the Government?

Third. Can a second condemnation by the Government be maintained?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield there to enable me to make this statement?

Mr. POST. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. A few moments ago I asked whether the gentleman had information as to the original Senate amendment providing for the purchase of this ground——

Mr. POST. I have not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have just gotten that amendment in the RECORD, here, on page 8438, if the gentleman will permit me, of the Sixty-first Congress, second session, which shows the total appropriation was $3,600,000.

Mr. POST. Well, after that they appropriated annually.

Mr. STAFFORD. After that went to conference, the conferees agreed to what the gentleman has stated is the law.

Mr. POST. The act of August 30, 1890, is materially different from the act of June 25, 1910. In the former act authority was given simply to purchase or condemn lands necessary for the extension of the Government Printing Office, the appropriation therefor was made prior to the condemnation proceedings, and the President of the United States was given authority, if he thought the public interest required it, to cause payment to be made to the respective persons entitled, according to the judgment of the court.

Now, there is a wide difference in the act of 1890. Congress did not say what property was to be acquired; Congress simply provided a commission to select a site and authorized the condemnation, but left it to the discretion of the President of the United States to say whether that site was a suitable site and to say whether the price fixed in the discretion of the President was suitable; but here in the act of June 23, 1910, Congress itself says that we declare that we intend to acquire this property. Congress selected the property, and did not leave or delegate the power to anybody to make that selection, and that is the difference between the two cases.

In the latter act Congress itself selected the exact area to be acquired, stating each tract by its square number, and declared in unequivocal terms its intention to acquire such property. It seems clear that under act of June 25, 1910, the act of August 30, 1890, became applicable, but the inquiry readily suggests itself, to what extent? In my opinion that act controls only so far as the application to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia becomes necessary in the proceedings to condemn the property sought to be acquired; that far and no further. In the latter case Congress determined in advance the identical property to be acquired and declared the public use to which it was to be put. There was nothing left for the determination by the President. The Congress had already determined that the public interest required the acquisition of this specific property. In the Government Printing Office act a discretion was clearly vested in the President, first, as to the specific property to be taken; second, whether or not the public interest required the taking of the exact property that had been condemned.

In these respects the two acts are essentially different. These essential differences clearly limit the Government Printing Office act to the proceeding to be had in the event it became necessary to exercise the right of eminent domain in the acquisition of any of this property under the act of June 25, 1910. The Congress having solemnly declared its purpose to acquire these grounds for public uses, naming them specifically, did not delegate to any other department of the Government the power and authority which it had properly exercised. In the one case the Congress delegated to the Executive the right to determine whether or not the public interest required the taking of certain property for the use of the Government Printing Office, and whether the exact property selected for that purpose was suitable to the Government needs. In the other case the Congress itself exercised these functions. The Congress having declared its intention to acquire this property, and having stipulated the purpose of its acquisition, such declaration became the law and there is no authority for any other department of the Government to annul the fixed purpose of the Congress. The right to withdraw from the declared purpose to acquire this property is necessarily vested with that department of the Government clothed with the power to acquire and to declare the public uses for which the acquisition is to be made. The determination of the Congress as to the propriety of the acquisition is paramount. A simple illustration will clearly demonstrate this. If the commission composed of the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Grounds had acquired the whole or a part of this property by purchase from the owner as they were authorized to do by act of June 25, 1910, and the owners had voluntarily deeded their property to the Government, the President would have been absolutely removed from the domain of its acquisition. If the commission had purchased a part of the squares sought to be acquired and the owners had voluntarily deeded the same to the Government, as to such part the title to the property purchased would have been good, and the President as to such part would have been absolutely removed from any discretion whatever in its acquisition. To me, then, it is perfectly clear that the Congress did not intend to delegate to the President any discretion in the premises.

The act of August 30, 1890, confers upon the President of the United States but a single power, and that is, if he thinks the public interest requires the acquisition of the property sought he can so designate. It does not specifically confer upon him the right to determine as to the amount fixed by the condemnation proceedings as being a proper value of the lands to be acquired. In the order filed by the President in the proceedings of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia it is declared that the public interest requires that the real estate should not be acquired by the United States for the sum fixed in the appraisement as confirmed by the court. The basis upon which the order is predicated is the appraisement fixed by the condemnation commission. It is apparent, then, that the President did not base his objection upon the grounds that the public interest did not require the acquisition of this property for the purpose declared by the Congress. It was based solely upon the price fixed by the commission. The courts have universally held that this can not be done unless accompanied by an absolute abandonment of the purpose to acquire. (Union Railway Co. v. Standard Wheel Co., 149 Fed. Rep., 701; C., R. I. & P. Railway Co. v. City of Chicago, 143 Ill., 641; Rogers v. The State of St. Charles, 3 Mo. Appls., 43.)

The very language used by the President indicates that if the sum fixed in the appraisement had been less, then it would have been in the public interest to acquire and take over the property. There is nowhere in the proceedings any declaration of a final and ultimate purpose to abandon. The property affected, in this case amounting to upward of $3,000,000 in value, is still clouded with the declaration of Congress of its intention to ultimately acquire it for the purpose expressed. This cloud is hanging over this property like Banquo's ghost since June 25, 1910, and has resulted in direful distress to the unfortunate holders of titles within its area. During this period no one would buy within that area after the declaration to acquire, unless for purely speculative purposes. No one of the owners of the 462 parcels of land affected could afford to erect buildings upon their property and make it productive; no one would take long leases upon buildings already erected within that area. By the filling in of the streets and avenues by the erection of the Union Station prior to this, many of the properties were destroyed, some without any compensation, others with only partial compensation for damages inflicted, and a great many of the properties left wholly without any use or rendered practically valueless for leasing purposes. Notwithstanding this long period, now more than five years in duration, taxes have become imposed and become a charge upon the landowner, street assessments charged against the abutting properties, and if mortgaged interest dates came with fixed regularity, and in some instances the proceedings have amounted practically to confiscation. The moment the declaration was made all power and privilege in the owner to sell, build upon, to execute long leases upon his property was brought practically to an absolute end.

To leave the title to this vast property clouded in this uncertainty and abandon these property owners to further distress and sacrifices, after Congress has solemnly declared its intention to acquire the property for the extension of the Capitol Grounds, would be to shock the conscience.

As heretofore pointed out, the judgment confirming the awards of the court commissioners was approved and confirmed by the court on February 24, 1913, and the President's objections were filed in that court on March 18, 1914, more than a year after the awards were confirmed. In the meantime Congress had spoken upon this subject in no unrestricted terms. In March, 1913, then within about a month after the time the judgment of the court was confirmed approving the appraisements by the court commissioners, Congress appropriated the exact amount necessary to pay the aggregate of the awards, and, in the language of the act, it was to complete the acquisition of the squares; and again in the act of June 25, 1913, Congress made the same appropriation for the exact purpose. In both cases Congress spoke upon the subject before the President intervened. It was not until the lapse of about eight months after Congress had appropriated the money to complete the acquisition of this property that the President filed in the court his disapproval. Even if it be conceded that by the act of August 30, 1890, the President did have a discretion in the premises, is it not fair to presume that by the act of June 30, 1913, appropriating the exact sum necessary to complete the acquisition of the squares, that this discretion was removed, and is it not reasonable to conclude, even granting that he had a discretion under the Government Printing Office act, that in approving this appropriation he exercised the discretion so conferred upon him; and if once exercised, can he again do so? The answer is certainly negative.

There is another consideration to which I desire to call attention. Squares 634 and 685 were condemned, paid for, and possession taken by the Government. This acquisition was concluded as early as May 18, 1912, and before proceedings were instituted to condemn the remaining squares. In this connection it was the declared purpose of Congress to acquire the whole of nine and one-half squares named in the act of 1910. It was not the purpose of Congress to acquire a part only of the property. The scheme for enlarging and extending the Capitol Grounds was a definite, distinct project, embodying the whole of the property. I do not believe it can be successfully contended that Congress in declaring its purpose to acquire the specific squares named in the act of 1910 intended to acquire a part only of the property. An isolated square or piece of property located at various points within the area defined would be of no benefit to the Government for the purpose declared. It required the acquisition of each and every parcel included within the limits defined in order to accomplish the declared purpose of the Congress. The acquisition of this property was to be an entirety, and the commissioners were empowered not to acquire a part only, but all, of the property designated, and were given ample authority to acquire it in one of two ways—first, by purchase; and if unsuccessful in this manner, then by exercise of the high right of eminent domain.

The authority conferred could mean nothing less than a complete acquisition of all the property. President Taft approved the awards that were made for squares 634 and 685, and ordered payment accordingly. The question then naturally arises whether or not the President, even conceding that he had the authority originally to enter his disapproval to the acquisition of the property, because in his opinion he thought the public interest would not justify its acquisition, after having sanctioned the acquisition of a part, could he reject the remainder?

The President based his order on the sum fixed in the appraisement as confirmed by the court and declared the public interest did not require that the Government should take over this real estate for the sum so fixed and for that reason alone directed that the proceeding be dismissed. On the other hand, the jury that fixed the awards was of the opinion that they were just and fair as between the owners and the Government. The commission so declared in a letter addressed to the Attorney General of the United States on February 6, 1913. (H. Doc. No. 1392.) This opinion was concurred in by the Attorney General and by those versed in real-estate values in the area in which the squares condemned are located; that the awards were reasonable; and that the land could not hereafter be acquired except at an increased valuation. (H. Doc. No. 1392.) The court so believed, as evidenced by the fact of its confirmation of the awards; and Congress so believed, as evidenced by its ordering payment twice of the sums necessary to pay the awards.

Is the judgment binding upon the property owners? It is certainly an anomalous situation. An entry stands of record dismissing and discontinuing the cause. In most States a time limitation is fixed by statute in which the appropriation must be accepted or abandonment will take place; yet so far as value and the purpose is concerned, the judgment is res adjudicata. In other words, where a value has been fixed for a particular purpose this becomes final in every subsequent attempt to appropriate for the same purpose.

The authorities are rather uniform in holding that when the power of eminent domain has been granted by legislative enactment that it is exhausted. (Mason v. Brooklyn City R. R., 35 Barb., 373; Brooklyn Central R. R. v. Brooklyn City, 32 Barb., 358; Hudson Canal Co. v. New York Railway, 9 Paige, 323; Kenton County v. Turnpike Co., 10 Bush, 529; Brigham v. Agricultural Branch R. R., 1 Allen, 316; Mills on Eminent Domain, Sec. 58.)

The court in the case of Moorhead et al. v. Little Miami Railroad Co. (17 Ohio, 340) say, in speaking of the power of the railroad to exercse the right of eminent domain which had been delegated by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, the corporators had the power to locate and construct a railroad; they could not exercise this right but once without a further grant to accomplish this object. A most important attribute was bestowed upon them by the legislature—the extraordinary reserve power of subjecting the property of private individuals to public use. If it was intended that this should be a continuing power, one that might be exercised, and reexercised again and again, as often as might suit the convenience of this company, the legislature should have so declared in express terms.

The court in Mason v. City of Brooklyn (35 Barb., 373) says:

> It is undoubtedly true that when a corporation chartered for the purpose of constructing a railway has located its lines it can not change the location and adopt a new route unless the power to do so is expressly granted in its charter, and then only in the manner indicated. This upon the plain principle that when the power thus conferred upon a company has once been exercised it is exhausted.

The Plaza case, to my mind, comes clearly within the scope of this principle. Congress created a commission and delegated to it the power of eminent domain; that commission has exercised its delegated powers, and having once exercised its powers in this respect, they are exhausted. Should the commission already existing again attempt to condemn it would be met at the very threshold of its proceeding with the plea that a judgment already exists between it and the property owners, hence the necessity for the creation of a new commission and the delegation of new authority. This leads to the question whether or not the judgment is final as against the United States. The United States is a Government clothed with all the powers of sovereignty delegated to it and not retained by the States. An examination of the origin and character of the high power of eminent domain will disclose that it is not exhausted or extinguished upon its exercise by the sovereign power of a State. It is one of the inherent powers of every government, and from its very nature can not be exhausted or extinguished.

That eminent jurist, Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, sixth division, chapter 15, page 644, says:

> The existence of a particular power in the Government is recognized on the ground of necessity, no delegation of the legislative power by the people can be held to vest authority in the department which holds it in trust, to bargain away such power, or to so tie up the hands of the Government as to preclude its repeated exercise, as often and under such circumstances as the needs of the Government may require. For if this were otherwise the authority to make laws for the government and welfare of the State might be so exercised in strict conformity with its constitution as at length to preclude the State performing its original and essential functions, and the agent chosen to govern the State might put an end to the State itself.

In the case of the United States v. Cooper, 20 District of Columbia, 104, it is said:

> It needs no citation of authority to show that the right to take private property for public uses in the exercise of the right of eminent domain belongs inherently to every nation justly calling itself independent and sovereign; that the power is so far-reaching that it extends in case of necessity to the right of disposing of all the wealth of the country; that this authority belongs to every State in the Union; that it existed in the General Government independently of and before the adoption of the fifth amendment of the Constitution, which only imposed a limitation to its exercise; and that, in the language of the Supreme Court, in Cherokee v. Kansas Railroad, 135 United States, 667, "all lands held by private owners everywhere within the geographical limits of the United States are held subject to the authority of the General Government, to take them for such objects as are germane to the execution of the powers granted to it: Provided, They will not be taken without just compensation being made to the owner."

The exercise of the right of eminent domain by a sovereignty can not be the creation of grant or compact. It inheres in the existence to an independent government, and comes into being eo instanti with its establishment, and continues as long as the government endures. The United States did not derive the right to exercise it in Louisiana from France, or in Florida from Spain, or in California from Mexico, or in Alaska from Russia; the right was coeval with its proprietorship as sovereign, and the United States could no more have abandoned the exercise of this right within the District of Columbia than it could have bound itself not to declare war or levy taxes without the assent of the Legislature of Maryland. The correct view in the power of eminent domain is not in reserve, but an inherent right—a right which pertains to sovereignty as a necessity, a constant and inextinguishable attribute.

Some very respectable authorities hold that a judgment in condemnation of private property to a public use is final and conclusive where the exercise of the power is by a sovereign State, but I am fully convinced that the weight of authority is to the contrary, and that upon principle it should be so. If the proposition was to be solved otherwise it would be to deprive a sovereign State of one of its inherent powers. In the case of a corporation or municipality it acts through delegated power and not by an inherent right. To permit a corporation or other legal entity to condemn private property until it obtained a price by judicial ascertainment, that would be destruction of the private ownership of property. But that is not applicable to a sovereign State and is based upon the theory that you can not divest the State of one of its inherent powers; that to do so would be destructive of the State itself, and that no injury can result to the owner of private property because the State will do no wrong, the latter no doubt being based upon the ancient fiction that the Crown can not commit a wrong.

As I have heretofore pointed out, the solemn declaration of Congress to ultimately acquire this property for the extension of the Capitol Grounds stands unimpeached and unimpaired. The more than five years of delay has wrought financial havoc among the various property owners affected, especially those of small holdings. Anyone familiar with the situation will agree with me that the long delay has brought upon the smaller holders a situation amounting to governmental spoliation. The conditions are such that we should act speedily in the matter and furnish to the unfortunate property holders just, speedy, and adequate relief. If the property is not to be taken, then relief should be given by removing the cloud that hangs over this property by an open, unequivocal declaration of abandonment to acquire.

Without any intention or design on its part the declaration of Congress to acquire this property for the most laudable purpose of extending, enlarging, and beautifying the grounds immediately surrounding this superb and magnificent building, the Nation's Capitol, has cast a cloud and destructive shadow upon the property affected, entailing hardships and heavy pecuniary losses to the property owners who are helpless victims. The existing conditions were forced upon them without their invitation or making. They are wholly without remedy. They are without a forum to which to appeal for relief. The Government is omnipotent and can not be sued for damages it has so unintentionally wrought. Congress alone can furnish some measure of relief by providing a method for consummating the purpose originally intended and enforcing its speedy execution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD further by incorporating a schedule of the lot owners with the appraisements.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POST. Now, I wish to say this much further, that I do not believe that the committee ought to vary from the practice which Congress has always followed in the acquisition of property on behalf of the United States Government; that we ought to create this commission which is provided for in House joint resolution 269. The difficulty with Mr. Johnson's resolution is that it is not extensive enough; it does not cover the project, and does not cover the original scheme. It simply creates a commission and empowers that commission to purchase such property as may be voluntarily offered to it. House joint resolution 269 is a complete scheme. It covers the entire project. It creates a commission and it delegates to that commission the power to purchase such property as may be voluntarily offered to it, and if it can not acquire all the property in that way it endows the commission with power to condemn such property that it may not be able to purchase.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LOGUE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 5042) legalizing certain conveyances heretofore made by the Central Pacific Railroad Co. and others within the State of Nebraska.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. STERLING as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

S. 4261. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4845. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5207. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5446. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5575. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 5843. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

PLAZA AWARDS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized for an hour, and I yield 15 minutes of that time to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, I will not undertake to present the legal aspects of this question, as that matter has been thoroughly thrashed out by the Members who have preceded me and who are bright, able attorneys. The question which presents itself to me is whether or not we shall acquire the entire tract or just own, as this last bill introduced and offered by Mr. JOHNSON contemplates, a few lots here and there surrounded by other property. Are we ready to conclude a bargain that is entered into by a previous Congress, be the bargain good or bad, or shall we indefinitely postpone? I do not understand the intricacies of the rules and regulations that govern the House of Representatives. I do know that this bill or a bill similar to this was referred to our Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and that a subcommittee of which I had the honor to be a member was appointed to make an investigation along these lines to clear up the condition of the Plaza awards, and I do know that we worked most diligently, honestly, and faithfully until we brought out the House joint resolution that is now on the calendar, No. 269, which will be offered as a substitute for the resolution presented by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I know that the legal aspects of this matter were thrashed out thoroughly, that the President of the United States was advised with on this proposition, and that after giving the matter careful attention we came to the conclusions that are embodied in the resolution, and that those conclusions were that an expedient way to settle up this matter would be better for the United States and better for the people who had been wronged—and when I say the people who have been wronged of course I do not refer to the railroad, because they can continue this matter indefinitely—I mean the small property owners who now can not get rentals out of this property and who could not sell nor mortgage and who could not rent or, in fact, use to advantage the rights that naturally belong to them.

And it is for those people that we considered that action rather than indefinite postponement was necessary. I have no more sympathy for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad than has the gentleman who has just preceded me. I do not know an officer of that organization; neither do I know a man connected with it; and yet I do not believe, nor do I think, that the able attorney, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, will hold that a letter dated in 1912, signed by the general counsel of that railroad, would bind that corporation to pay or to accept a certain price for their land.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit right there, I will say that my argument as I endeavored to make it was to show that the representations of those people prevailed upon Congress to pass a bill to acquire property at one price and then afterwards insisted that it should be acquired at a very much larger price.

Mr. BARTON. Would not the gentleman think that would consist more of sharp practice than it would of a straight business agreement that could be held unlawful?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I never meant to indicate anything else except that it was sharp practice. I know full well that there is no paper that I have seen which would bind the railroad to a sale.

Mr. BARTON. Thank you. Then, arguing from that standpoint, in fixing the amount we shall pay the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, we must take into consideration that there are two sets of interests to conserve—the interests of the United States, and we can well expect the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to take care of its own interests. I do not believe that we as the Congress of the United States could fix a price that would force the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to sell. And if we could, and that authority was granted us, there would be such indefinite postponement of that proceeding that the park that has been planned and that we are anxious to see, now since it has been started, would be beyond the life, probably, of the Members of this Congress.

I am frank to state that had I been here when that bill was first originated I should have voted against it, but now we have a condition and not a theory, and I think that the solution of that condition is well met in the conclusions of our committee. I do not know the value of that property. The other Members of this body I am satisfied do not know the value of that property. We must trust some one. Then the question is: Whom shall we trust? In our report we say:

> The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Grounds, be, and they are hereby, appointed a commission for the purpose of acquiring the said tract or parcels of land by either purchase or condemnation proceedings, making payment or settlement therefor out of the appropriations heretofore made and herein referred to, and in the acquirement of the said tract or parcels of land, the said commission to have power and authority as follows.

We have made provision that in case this land can not be purchased at once that there can be recondemnation proceedings, so that we can acquire the land. The bill introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] I do not believe makes this provision. I am in favor of excluding the professional juryman just the same as is the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. I do not believe that any man who has any interest, direct or indirect, in the property in this plaza award should be considered as a juryman. And, at that, I have confidence enough to think that the Democratic marshal who selects this jury would have consideration enough, after the words that have been spoken from the floor of this House along that line, to heed the admonition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman mean to say that the United States Marshal of the District of Columbia would have anything whatever to do with the selection of a jury?

Mr. BARTON. Is he not sent by the court to bring them in?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He is not. The court selects them itself.

Mr. BARTON. I will leave that for you lawyers. Lawyers never do agree, anyway, and I will leave that for one of the gentlemen who will follow me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no dispute about that. The trial court just selected the last three commissioners who fixed these values, and if it is to be determined under the same act as then, the trial court would select the commissioners again.

Mr. BARTON. If that be true, then I am willing and anxious to amend this provision of ours, if it is adopted as a substitute, in such a manner that it will be impossible to give it a different construction, that all of these people you name in your resolution shall be excluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that under the usual condemnation proceeding in the District of Columbia, that which is provided for by the code of laws for the District of Columbia, the United States marshal does nominate to the court certain persons for the jury, but under the statute of 1890, under which we are proceeding now, the United States marshal has nothing whatever to do with it. The court itself makes the selection.

Mr. LOGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. LOGUE. In the resolution that comes from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds we especially provide that the court shall hear objection, and the court therefore does actually select.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The court has never been without the right to hear objections, and when you put that in the bill you give him no right he did not have before.

Mr. LOGUE. Of course, they have the right, and it does not lessen the effect of the court's action.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That does not change the statement at all that the United States marshal has nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. LOGUE. It merely provides that he shall summon the jurors and the court shall select.

Mr. BURNETT. I think the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON] is correct. The language of the resolution is that after the return of the marshal—that is, of the notices giving notice to the respondents or the property holders provided therein—the court shall cause the jury of six experienced jurors, disinterested men, who shall be residents of and freeholders in the District of Columbia, and so on, to be summoned by said marshal. That does not mean that the court shall designate the names of the jurors. That is the language in many of the States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. While the gentleman from Alabama said he was reading from the statute, he is not.

Mr. BURNETT. I am reading from this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have said, and I insist, that under what is known as the public-printing act of 1890 the marshal has nothing to do with the selection of the jury.

Mr. BURNETT. I have not controverted the statement and have not said I was reading from the act. I said I was reading from the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman in revising his remarks will take notice of that part where he said that that is what the statute says.

Mr. BURNETT. I meant that this bill says that. Regardless of what the general law is, this bill when it becomes a statute will control, and under this bill, in my judgment—and I do not think it can be otherwise—the marshal himself will select the jury. That is the language in many of the States in the Union. It is the language in my State. The probate judge, who has jurisdiction of condemnation proceedings, orders the sheriff to summon the jury, and the sheriff goes and selects them; and under the language employed in this bill I do not think there is any question about the fact that the marshal himself will select them. Then the court, before accepting the jury, summoned by the marshal, as I think it means, shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power and authority to pass upon any such objection and to excuse any juror or cause to be filled any vacancy in the jury to be impaneled, and so on.

Mr. LOGUE. Would not that, if enacted, no matter what other provisions are made by existing statute, provide a way for the summoning of a jury and the selection of a jury in this particular proceeding without regard to the existing laws?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. I just stated that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no provision in the bill anywhere to the effect that persons holding liens upon that property or professional jurymen shall not serve.

Mr. LOGUE. It says "people in interest."

Mr. BURNETT. It says they are not interested in any way, and are not related to any parties that are interested therein.

Mr. BARTON. It seems as though that is very explicit.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. I am opposed to the commission as set out in the resolution introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think that the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House and the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate have ample time to make these awards. I feel that their responsibility is greater than that of any outsider that could be brought in to adjust this matter. I know that they serve without pay, and there is no incentive for them to continue indefinitely making these awards. Mr. CLARK of Florida is the only one of the Members with whom I have the honor of a personal acquaintance; but as a working member of that committee I know he is an able, conscientious, and tireless worker. I know he is extremely conscientious at all times; and I want to say, as a minority member of that committee, representing the minority—and I know the entire committee, and, I believe, the entire House of Representatives—that we could not choose a man of higher grade as one of that commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. BARTON. I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand the workings of a Member's mind who comes to the conclusion that a Member of this body and a Member of our associate body, the Senate, who are responsible to the people, can not and will not perform this service with as much honesty and with as good judgment as any outsider who is responsible to no one. I do not know Elliott Woods any more than Brother JOHNSON does, but if he is not a man in whom we could place that trust he is not a fit man to fill the position that he now holds.

The public buildings commission bill that will be offered as a substitute is a well-considered bill and one that means action. We should, in justice to the people who own the property, act and not indefinitely postpone by naming a paid commission, whose pay depends upon their length of service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will not the gentleman admit that their pay does not depend upon their length of service? Does it not say in so many words that their compensation shall be agreed upon between themselves and the President before they begin the work?

Mr. BARTON. It is very indefinite, is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; it is as certain as can be.

Mr. BARTON. It is indefinite in amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. The President is perfectly familiar with this subject, and he knows how long it will take to do the work.

Mr. BARTON. I do not believe that the President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to another thing: The measure he is advocating appropriates $15,000 for an undefined purpose. The one I am advocating does nothing of the sort.

Mr. BARTON. I would rather advocate a certain amount to do a certain business, with the qualification that it does not necessarily take all the proceeds of the amount, than to leave an indefinite proposition open to any amount that might be fixed. And I want to say further that I do not believe even the President of the United States—and I hold him in as high regard as does the gentleman from Kentucky—I do not believe the President of the United States has any better judgment as to a committee or a commission that shall sit in a position of this character than have the Members of this body.

I think the main point in the whole controversy is this: Do we want little tracts of land scattered all over the award or do we want one body of land? Do we want an indefinite postponement, with litigation with the railroad company, or do we want a recondemnation and a price fixed and paid and the awards made?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. BARTON. Yes——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say that, in my judgment, the gentleman has misconceived the issue entirely. While they are minor issues, the dominant one is, Shall the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad receive nearly $600,000 more than they have said they would take?

Mr. BARTON. I will say in reply that I admire the stand that the gentleman has taken in his fight against the interests in the District of Columbia, be they the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. or any other interests that are working for their selfish aggrandizement——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Thank you, sir——

Mr. BARTON. But I do want to say further that I think sometimes, maybe, the zeal and enthusiasm which the gentleman from Kentucky injects into his tireless fight along this line may lead him over the line of discretion and beyond the dictates of his best judgment, and I do not believe that any commission that we would appoint or that the President would approve would recommend an award if it was shown that there was a profit or rake-off, you might say, of the $600,000 to be paid to any interest, regardless of whether it is the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. or anyone else; that the President would let it pass unchallenged. I have absolute confidence in the President's honesty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, there are two resolutions before the committee. One is a resolution reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia; and as a substitute for that, which will be offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE], is the resolution reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. There are not many essential differences between the two resolutions. The main purpose of the resolution reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was that these poor property owners shall expeditiously and quickly be paid that which ought to have been paid to them many months ago. On account of the unfortunate wording of the statute, as construed by the Department of Justice, the President was not permitted to segregate these awards and pay them separately. If he had been permitted to do so, the question would have been settled a long time ago.

There are many legal collateral questions that have been injected into this debate that, I think, have no relevancy whatever. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has argued that the condemnation proceedings that have been had in these matters are a nullity. I doubt very much whether the fact that there was a confirmation of these awards, four days in advance of the time when they should have been confirmed, makes them void. Perhaps it renders them voidable, but upon a collateral attack they would not be void.

But if we believe the contention of the gentleman that those proceedings are a nullity then the weakness of the gentleman's resolution becomes more apparent. In our resolution we provide for the payment of all these awards separately. The commission may treat with any of the property holders, and if they can arrive at what they believe to be a just compensation for the property then they can make the purchase at a price not to exceed the award in the former condemnation proceedings. That is as far as the commission provided for by the resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia may go. That resolution does not permit a condemnation. If the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad or any one of these individual landholders should refuse to sell, the matter simply stops there. It seems to me that puts it in the hands not only of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad but of any of the small landholders to say to the Government, "You have no right of condemnation. You can not help yourself, therefore I will refuse your offer of purchase. I know you have got to have this property; if not now, then later on. You can not take it in a checkerboard system." And that is what it would result in if the right of condemnation was not lodged with the commission. We purchase one lot here and the man next to it says that by reason of that purchase and by reason of the fact that you are going to have a park "this adjoining lot has become more valuable and therefore I will refuse to take any price that you may offer, because you have not the power under the law to force me to take it." It seems to me that is one vice of the resolution of the gentleman. It simply puts it into the hands of property owners to hold up the Government; and then we can not take it under condemnation proceedings.

As an original proposition I think perhaps Congress went far afield in trying to select a great deal of this property; but they have done so. Condemnation proceedings have been had. Many of the very poor people of this city, many of those over whose property mortgages are now hanging, many of those who have been unable to pay their legitimate debts and liens upon that property are unable to do so because the Government has waited so long after having placed a cloud upon that property that has reduced the rent and reduced the value of the property in a way that these people could not dispose of it nor even rent it for a fair price.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman if the persons to whom he is just this minute referring are those who will sit down on their property and hold it for better prices?

Mr. BURNETT. No; they are not all of that class. Unfortunately, those people would have to take the price offered them; but the more opulent neighbor over in the next block could say, "Well, my neighbor is forced in his extremity to take what you propose, but I do not have to take it." Therefore that more opulent man will be the beneficiary of the proposition of the gentleman. That is what it may easily result in.

Now, my judgment is that most of these people are willing to be settled with, outside of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and especially if we have hanging over them the power of condemnation. The gentleman from Kentucky says that the Baltimore & Ohio are in the courts. I will not go extensively into the legal propositions involved in this case. I have had my serious doubts whether every one of these condemnation cases and awards was not res judicata. It is true that in the statute is the provision that when the President believes it to the public interest, he may pay for the property, and then it becomes condemned, and the property is the Government's. But, Mr. Chairman, I believe that provision may be construed by the courts to be only a provision in the interest of the property holders, to prevent the heavy hand of the Government being laid on property at any time in violation of that constitutional provision that it must be by due process after compensation tendered. Hence that question may come up on these condemnation proceedings. If we undertake to go on with the Baltimore & Ohio case now pending, or with any of these others, that may be a question. But, Mr. Chairman, the very fact that these people have been through the mill for months will make most of them willing to take the award; and that is what our resolution provides, that the tender of compensation shall not exceed the amount provided for in these awards.

Then, if there were condemnation proceedings, the Attorney General thinks the President had the veto power over the award, and that they had a right to set aside the proceedings. If that is true, is it not safer from the Government standpoint to see that there is the right of condemnation in this resolution and the right of exercising the power of eminent domain in order to keep the property holders themselves from holding up the Government and demanding excessive price by purchase?

In regard to the commission itself, it seems to me that there can be no better men from the standpoint of the Government, nor from the standpoint of the people, than the chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee of the Senate and the chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee of the House. Mr. Woods is the man who is in charge of the Capitol Grounds. He is a man who knows a great deal about it, and therefore the committee put him on there as one of the commissioners. But the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky provides that no Member of Congress and no ex-Member of Congress shall be a member of this commission. If we want to get those who are of the best material, in the interest of both parties we should select some Member of Congress who is especially familiar with business of this kind. Who could be more so than the able chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House, who has been a member of this committee six or eight years? When he was named in our report as a member of the commission he had been renominated, and therefore we knew that for at least two years more he could be a Member of the House. Then there is the distinguished Senator from Virginia, Mr. SWANSON, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who has been in the House and the Senate for years, and who has been on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the Senate for several years himself. Who could know more or would be more competent to judge of these things, Mr. Chairman, than these distinguished gentlemen?

I think I am communicating no committee secrets improperly when I say that when this question was discussed it was proposed that exactly the same membership that the old commission was based on should compose the commission, to wit, the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate, and yet for the very reason that I have stated we thought it wise to substitute the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Speaker and Vice President, while very busy men, would not know; their position would not bring them so often in contact with these matters as would that of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House.

Mr. Chairman, we have had some experience in regard to the work of these two gentlemen, the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds, and their willingness to do it, in the splendid report just made to Congress provided for in the bill we passed last session, providing for a commission consisting of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and the chairman of the Committee in the House on Public Buildings and Grounds, and two or three Cabinet officers. Mr. Chairman, I believe that if we were to ask the Cabinet officers themselves, they would state to us that the chairmen of the Senate and House committees did the greatest part of the work in looking into these questions, and in getting up and making the report.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I think that they would make the better commission. We went into the matter with deliberation. We were on it for weeks and months, and we felt anxious to bring it to a conclusion in order that the poor people over whom debts were hanging, and who had been unintentionally mistreated by the Government in not receiving the awards allotted to them on this property, might get relief. We wanted to hasten it and get it along more rapidly, and yet we held session after session, meeting after meeting, conferring with the President and some Cabinet officers in order to reach a just conclusion in regard to these matters.

We have the report of the Attorney General on the bill, so far as he was willing to make a report. He regarded it as a matter that he had no right to make a report on except as a mere suggestion, but in that report you will find a letter from the Attorney General in which he states that he believes the power of veto ought to remain in the President, so far as the condemnation proceedings are concerned.

Now, that is left in the resolution of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. If the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. undertakes to hold up the Government—and I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Kentucky that it is true that they have done so—if they should do so again, do you believe that Mr. CLARK, of Florida, or Mr. SWANSON, of Virginia, would agree to that hold-up scheme? If they did not, o ht we not to have the right of condemnation? Look at the map, and you will see that if we do not destroy the absolute harmony of this proposition from here to the Union Station we will be compelled to have some of the lots claimed by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., and if so, and this commission can not agree as to the value of the property, then will you tie the hands of the Government, and have to come up here at the next session of Congress and ask for power to condemn, because that is what you are doing if you adopt the resolution of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

You would be coming here at the next session and doing that which we ought to do now, and that is, authorize a condemnation, and leave with the President the veto power to say that if that award is too high either as to the Baltimore & Ohio or anybody else he has the right to set it aside. It seems to me that in the resolution which we offer we make it much clearer that the President has that power than in the former law, and we provide that it is no award until that power is exercised, if exercised in 60 days. We give him 60 days within which to make that veto, and then we say that after the expiration of those 60 days, if he does not exercise it, and not until the expiration of 60 days, this becomes an award. Hence it seems to me it is much better than the law under which we acted before.

As I said a moment ago, I have considerable doubt as to whether the veto of the President, expressed as it is in the uncertain terms of the former law, means anything except that it was put there in the interest of the landowner himself. But we have tried to correct all of these uncertainties. Mr. Chairman, I would not care if an amendment similar to that suggested by the gentleman in his resolution was placed upon our resolution limiting the amount that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was to receive to the actual cost of the property and 6 per cent interest thereon. But, it seems to me, as has been said by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON], that it is rather an imputation upon the honesty of the marshal of the District to say that he would summon a dishonest jury, because I do contend that in the resolution that we have framed the judge orders the marshal to summon six jurors, and the marshal then selects the jurors and summons them, and reports them to the court, and then the court hears any objections that may be made to their acceptance. That is the law in many States. As I recollect it, that is the law in our State; the probate judge, who has jurisdiction of condemnation proceedings, orders the sheriff to summon the commission or the jury for the purpose of viewing the property and making the award. The judge is not expected to do it, and if that is the law under which they have been acting heretofore in the District—and I have no right to dispute the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]—the resolution that we offer here is a modification of that, and requires the judge to order the marshal to summon them; and do we believe here—are we willing to stand here and admit that in the very inception of this administration a marshal has been appointed who will go around for the purpose of helping the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad or anybody else? If so, the same imputation might be made against the sheriffs in all of the counties and in all of the States that have similar provisions. For that reason I think the particularity with which the gentleman specifies that jurors must be men who are not in any way interested in this and that way is unnecessary, and I think that is covered by the provision in our resolution that they must be disinterested people. As lawyers, we know that sometimes there is too much specification. The gentleman goes on and specifies the particulars in which they will be excludable. If there is some other particular kind of interest or some other kind of reason for which, perhaps, under a challenge for cause they might be thrown out, then might not the inclusion of those particular specifications in his resolution mean the exclusion of some other very important specification that the gentleman has omitted through the very particularity in which he indulges?

Mr. Chairman, I believe those are the mean features of difference between us. Here is a commission composed of the chairmen of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds in the Senate and in the House and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. The gentleman in arguing that says Mr. Woods, the superintendent, will have the right to act as umpire and to decide a difference between Mr. CLARK and Mr. SWANSON. Does anybody believe that there ever will be any difference as to the matters of right and principle between those two splendid Democrats? I do not charge that the gentleman means any kind of insinuation or imputation of that kind in his resolution. I know he does not. He simply takes the broad position that Members of Congress have not time to do these things, and therefore he wants to appoint a commission that is to be paid, a commission that may go on indefinitely, a commission that is authorized, at $5 a day, to employ clerks and stenographers, and to entail all these expenses, when here is a commission that will act without pay. All that is provided for is not exceeding $15,000 which the may pay out in actual expenses that may be incurred in securing the titles to this property. Not a cent for CLARK, not a cent for SWANSON, not a cent for Woods, and yet the gentleman's resolution provides for a sort of indefinite commission that the President, who has only been here for a year, shall appoint, while here are gentlemen who have been here for years. Who would be the most likely to select a good commission to act on the facts, the President of the United States, with his manifold duties, or this Congress itself by the selection of the chairmen of the committees of the House and the Senate, men who have been on this class of committees for a long time, having to do with these matters constantly, so that they are able to see the dangers and pitfalls of those who are trying to hold the Government up?

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the propositions involved in the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky? One ties the hands of the Government to an absolute purchase. One gives the President the power to appoint an indefinite commission, and the gentleman says that the main thing, that the great leading central idea is not to permit the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to hold up the Government and mulct it in damages they ought not to have. Mr. Chairman, is that brought about by simply empowering the commission to say to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad that we will give you this, and if you do not want to take it, there it ends? If you look at the map, you will see that the checkerboard system that will be brought about by refusing to permit condemnation of some of the property will make it so highly inharmonious that any man coming from the station up here, when it is cut up, will be absolutely astonished to look upon what the Government has done. There are places, as the gentleman has said, where, as an original proposition, I do not believe they should have been taken. Some of those are perhaps the poor people, those whose property has been held up. As an original condemnation, I believe they ought not to have been taken, but, Mr. Chairman, there is a question of justice. It is very often said that our Government damages its people and, on some occasions, it is slower pay than any great corporation or individuals, and we know sometimes that accusation is unjust. Now, the Government, under the exercise of the right of eminent domain, as provided for by this former bill, has gone and made this condemnation. It has depressed rental values and the value of the property of these people. Now, what is just, what is right in regard to the matter? It is of no use to quibble over these unimportant legal questions.

Every single one of the squares which are provided for by a condemnation in our bill is provided for in the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, hence the gentleman can not argue, of course, that we ought to leave out some of these lots, because he is giving the commission power to go and purchase these very squares. We simply give them the power to go and purchase them and pay for them by segregation, or if we can not purchase them then we condemn them if we think it proper to do so. Those are the questions that are involved. It is a matter which was referred to our committee. I, as acting chairman, when the gentleman from Florida was away for a month or two, sought some way by which our committee could decline to act upon that proposition. I felt that as the Committee on Appropriations had acted upon it that that committee ought to have it; but, as was said by the chairman of that committee, the matter came before us as an amendment of the Senate, and hence would have gone out on a point of order if a point of order had been made if the House Committee on Appropriations had now taken jurisdiction, and on an investigation I found that there was no legitimate or proper way by which the committee over which I was then presiding could shirk the responsibility. I believe it is in the interest of the Government and in the interest of the people that the substitute offered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should be adopted, and I hope it will be done. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question of the chairman, or the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and that is if the gentleman ought not to make the point of no quorum or adjourn under the circumstances presented here? It has been stated that the presence of a minority was needed to prevent abuses. The leader of the minority is absent, and those great manufacturing and commercial States are practically without one representative on the part of the minority, and I think if the gentleman wishes to be fair, whether they have gone on pleasures of their own or business of their own rather than on congressional business, that he ought to have a call of the House and bring them back to their duties.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the rest of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky (continuing). That I am anxious to get to the end of general debate, or, in other words, it is self-evident that this matter can not be concluded this evening; and I wish when it comes up upon the next day for its consideration that it will not then be open to general debate and the entire time be taken up under general debate instead of under the five-minute rule. I am anxious to get this afternoon to where the bill will be under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? It is now 5 o'clock and very oppressive. Could not we have some agreement that general debate at the next meeting will be limited to, say, half an hour, 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky and 15 minutes on this side, and then to take up the bill under the five-minute rule? It is a very important bill, and I say, in behalf of that suggestion, that when the committee next meets there will be a large membership here, and the Members would like to hear a concise statement in 15 minutes on a side as to the merits of these respective propositions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin will agree that under the five-minute rule we can get just as much out of it as we can under a 15-minute discussion on a side.

Mr. STAFFORD. And there is going to be considered when we rise other legislation, and I would suggest to the gentleman that in the absence of a quorum we had better rise and try to have some agreement as to general debate for half an hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Perhaps we can get to the five-minute rule in a few minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think we can. I think it would be advisable—and I am desirous of expediting the consideration of the bill—that we rise and limit the debate to half an hour. I think that will meet with general approval.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will not insist on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is now 5 o'clock. Other matters are to be brought up, and I would like that we should not sit during this kind of weather after half past 5; and it is about time that we should rise.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would the gentleman be willing to go to the place where general debate be closed, with the understanding that there will be 15 minutes for general debate on a side the next time the bill is up?

Mr. STAFFORD. Fifteen minutes on a side will be acceptable so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to have an understanding as to what "this side" and "that side" means. We would expect to control one-half of the time with the proponents of the substitute.

Mr. STAFFORD. Say that there be 40 minutes' time—20 minutes to be controlled by the other side and 20 minutes by this side. But I think that half an hour will be ample.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to know whether the gentlemen would be willing to take the rest of the House into their confidence?

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggested to the gentleman having the bill in charge that we now rise, and limit the debate to half an hour—one half of the time to be controlled by the side in favor of one proposition and the other half by the side in favor of the other proposition. I know that there is a gentleman on this side opposed to the resolution who would like to have 15 minutes.

Mr. LOGUE. Would the gentleman be in favor of 45 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman on that side who wishes to speak 15 minutes is opposed to the resolution?

Mr. LOGUE. Let the control come over here, so that we can allow him that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, if I understand the gentleman's proposition, it is that when the bill is under consideration, after to-day, 30 minutes are to be given to general discussion, 15 minutes to be controlled by me and 15 minutes by himself?

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been suggested by the chairman of the committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that there be 20 minutes on a side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And then, if we agree upon 20 minutes on a side——

Mr. STAFFORD. Twenty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If we reach that agreement, then we will proceed further along this afternoon, so as to reach the five-minute stage?

Mr. STAFFORD. We could not do that. We will proceed, then, at the termination of 40 minutes' general debate to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule at the next meeting.

Mr. MOORE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Will the Chair kindly indicate the agreement under which we are now proceeding?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no agreement, the Chair understands, except that general debate shall be confined strictly to the subject matter under consideration. There is no limit of time fixed by the House.

Mr. MOORE. We were unable to get the drift of the understanding on this side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all general debate be closed upon this bill in 40 minutes when it is next taken up, 20 minutes to be controlled by me and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that an order of that kind would have to be made in the House and not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having under consideration bills relating to the District of Columbia, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate joint resolution 129, relating to the awards and payments thereon in what are commonly known as the Plaza cases, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when this bill is up for consideration again all general debate shall close within 40 minutes after the bill is taken up; 20 minutes to be controlled by myself and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that when Senate joint resolution 129 is reached again general debate shall be limited to 40 minutes, 20 minutes to be controlled by himself and 20 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONVEYANCES MADE BY THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a resolution passed by the Senate, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 5042) legalizing certain conveyances heretofore made by the Central Pacific Railroad Co. and others within the State of Nevada.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the Senate, as expressed in the resolution, will be granted and the bill returned.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Colombian treaty.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Colombian treaty. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 14, 1914.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Lord, we come to Thee because Thou art worthy to be praised and to be held in everlasting remembrance by the children of men. Thou art the giver of every good and of every perfect gift, and we come to make mention that Thy name is exalted and to declare Thy doings among Thy people. May we this day honor Thy great name, and as we meet responsibilities to our country may we not forget our obligations to Thee. As we seek the interest of men may we remember that "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." May our ear be open to Thy voice, and may our responses to the call of every duty be sincere, patriotic, and complete. We ask it in Jesus' name. Amen.

INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on yesterday after the reading of the Journal the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] called attention to the fact that he held in his hand some newspaper clippings which he wanted to have read "for the edification and comfort" of his "friends the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and some others." Later on he alluded to us as "the lamentators." The Senator had those read into the RECORD, after which he was followed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], with somewhat similar articles.

The Senator from Missouri suggested that he would have similar articles to insert from day to day. The Senator said:

That is all I shall insert this morning, but I think I will take occasion morning after morning to furnish my friends on the other side with some comforting evidence of the real condition of the country.

I will now ask the Senator from Missouri if he has any further articles to present to-day for insertion in the RECORD?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, as I see some evidences of rising temperature in those who are suffering from the calamity fever, I may offer a dose of soothing sirup this morning, and small doses from time to time.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator alludes——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GALLINGER. For what purpose?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator seems to want a lead this morning, and I thought I would give it to him. The Senator from Missouri——

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I was talking to the Senator from Missouri, who had promised us some further enjoyment this morning. I do not know that I want to get the Senator from North Carolina involved in any matter that the Senator from Missouri is in charge of.

Mr. STONE. He is the consulting surgeon.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was not for the purpose of helping the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Missouri can help himself. He can take care of himself better than any other person I know in public life in America; but I thought the Senator from New Hampshire wanted a lead, and having some papers which he drew from his pocket, as he seemed to be soliciting the Senator from Missouri to give him a lead in the matter, I thought I would do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from North Carolina can follow just as well as lead. The Senator usually leads, but I prefer that he should follow this morning.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a great many newspaper clippings in my desk and I have scores of them in my committee room, and I thought yesterday I would insert some of them in the RECORD, but I find in the Washington Post of this morning some very interesting reading, which I will introduce instead of the others. I will first ask that this brief item shall be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JOBS OF 1,000 MEN GONE—WAGES OF OTHERS ARE REDUCED AT THE BIG PLANTS IN WILMINGTON, DEL.

[Special to the Washington Post.]

WILMINGTON, DEL., July 13.

The industrial depression has struck Wilmington with vigor. It was announced to-day by officials of the Harlan & Hollingsworth Corporation that 1,000 workmen have been discharged during the past few weeks.

The officials, when asked, declined to blame the Democratic administration for the condition. In addition, the Pennsylvania Railroad shops and the plant of the American Car & Foundry Co. have placed their employees on reduced wages. The repair shops of the Pullman Car Co. have also begun reducing their force.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, "Holland" writes most interestingly a daily letter to certain newspapers in the country. I have noticed during the last couple of months that "Holland" has been endeavoring to bolster up the industrial and trade conditions of the country. He has been doing precisely what the manufacturers have been doing. The manufacturers have kept back the actual conditions as far as they could, because they want to keep their credit good, so as to be able to borrow money. They do not want to advertise to the world that they are in financial distress or industrial disturbance. The other day I read a letter in the Boston Herald from a large manufacturer, in which he said he had gotten tired of lying and he was going to tell the truth. He said, "For the last six months I have been saying business is pretty good, but the fact is that business is wretchedly bad, and now I am going to tell the public the truth about it." "Holland" evidently has reached the same conclusion, and this morning he has this to say. He has a good deal more to say, but as I do not want to take any unnecessary time, I will ask that only a part of the article be read.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I heard an interesting article read from a newspaper just now regarding Wilmington, Del. May I ask who presented the article?

Mr. GALLINGER. I presented it. I took it from the Washington Post. It purports to be a special dispatch from Wilmington.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I may say, if the Senator will permit me, in regard to that article that it is not an unusual thing for a thousand men be out of employment in Wilmington. We are very fortunate to have only a thousand men out of employment.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is in only one establishment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Harlan & Hollingsworth Car Manufacturing Co., the American Car & Foundry Co., and the Pullman Car Co. have their shops there.

Mr. GALLINGER. The statement was that those concerns were also in more or less distress, and 1,000 men had been dismissed from one particular concern.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I also noticed that the American Car & Foundry Co. was mentioned. This is the eastern branch of that large car-building works; and I may say that the condition in Wilmington, where there are many shops which are furnishing car supplies, is that when men have been discharged, and I have been told by many of the men themselves, they have been laid off when there was work in the shops to do. I do not mean to say that that condition exists in all the shops, but these men told me they had been discharged when they had as much work to do as ever. They told me they could not be fooled by alleged conditions when they were discharged and work existed in the shops which could be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a most extraordinary suggestion. Of course it will go into the RECORD for what it is worth. The idea that when work is at hand in any manufacturing concern men are discharged is certainly food for the marines and not for the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I ask the Senator if it is not conceivable that where there are large communities greatly interested in railroad supplies, when peculiar conditions exist pending certain investigations which have been going on by the Interstate Commerce Commission, these conditions may not be as serious as they look?

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly so; but there is no suggestion that that is the condition in Wilmington alone. I should like to have read what "Holland" has further to say.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I think I will occupy the time now for a little while.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Washington Post.]

"HOLLAND" WRITES OF HUGE LOSSES BUSINESS HOUSES HAVE SUFFERED IN SIX MONTHS—EXPORTS ALONE HOLD OWN—ONE CORPORATION, IN A PRIVATE REPORT, FINDS THAT ITS BUSINESS DROPPED FROM $3,000,000 IN ONE-HALF OF 1912 TO ABOUT $900,000 FOR THE SAME PERIOD THIS YEAR—SOME OF REASONS OFFERED.

NEW YORK, July 13.

While the managers of many of the big industrial corporations think it inexpedient to report for publication what their business for the first half of the present calendar year was, measured in dollars and compared with a like period in the previous year, as well as in 1912, nevertheless, some of them do tell in confidence what their recent experiences have been. For instance, one of the largest of American industrial corporations caused a comparison to be made on July 1 of the business done in the first six months of 1912, and then, again, the business of a like period of last year, and also the business done in the six months which have just ended.

GREAT LOSS IN BUSINESS.

Their sales in a period of normal business activity approximate about $3,000,000 for six months. The total business done in the first six months of 1912 was a little under $3,000,000. The total business done last year in the same period was a little over $1,800,000. Their business for the first six months of the present year was, in round numbers, $900,000. Of course, these managers look with apprehension upon a report of this kind.

A falling off such as these figures show can not be met much longer without compelling the managers of the industry to consider the expediency of liquidating or possibly of greatly reducing their capital.

Mr. GALLINGER. "Holland" says a good deal more along the same line. I will refrain from presenting it, but I do want to present a very interesting editorial from this morning's Washington Post, and I commend it to the farmers of Missouri, as well as to the farmers in other parts of the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire ask for the reading?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I want to have it read, as the farmers of the country will want to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE FARMER LOSES.

In the 10 months ended April, 1914, the value of foreign foodstuffs imported into the United States increased $10,000,000, or $1,000,000 a month. This money, which should have gone to the American farmer, went to foreign farmers.

In the same period the exports of American foodstuffs decreased $64,416,000, or $6,400,000 a month.

The adverse balance against the American farmer, so far as dealings with the outside world are concerned, is $75,000,000 in 10 months.

During the 10 months ended April, 1914, there were imported 20,058,998 bushels of oats, as against 714,767 bushels imported during the same period ended April, 1913. Comparing the same periods, there were imported 1,854,054 bushels of wheat, against 769,329; other breadstuffs, $2,602,952, against $1,362,630; fruits, $26,155,168, against $21,635,382; nuts, $722,217, against $636,290; butter, $1,633,515, against $253,513; cheese, $9,302,438, against $7,683,399; olive oil, $6,444,247, against $5,815,810; prepared vegetables, $3,015,545, against $2,772,100; fresh vegetables, $1,468,396, against $1,308,821. The importation of eggs during the 10 months ended April, 1914, amounted to 5,043,765 dozen, valued at $1,000,000.

These are staples produced by American farms, orchards, and gardens. The new tariff reduces the duty upon these articles and opens the market to foreign farmers. The foreigner has seized this opportunity and is now making $1,000,000 a month which formerly went to the American farmer.

The consumer gets no benefit from this tariff reduction. The price has not gone down on a single article mentioned. The high tariff formerly kept the foreigner out and gave this business to the American farmer. The new tariff throws the business to the foreign farmer, who, with the middleman, pockets the benefit, and the consumer pays as much as he did before. The only loser is the American farmer.

This loss of $1,000,000 a month covers only 10 months of the new tariff. It is natural that the loss should be greater as soon as foreign farmers awaken to the splendid opportunity offered by the American market. The more they take advantage of this opportunity the more the American farmer will lose.

The only way to prevent this loss to the American farmer is to put the bars up again, and shut out the foreigner. The experiment has been in effect long enough to show that it does not decrease the cost of living.

Maybe this item of $1,000,000 a month loss through the low tariff will be borne in mind by the American farmer when he votes next November for Congressmen who frame tariff bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is all I care to put into the RECORD this morning, and——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will just withhold his interruption for a moment—that is all I care to put into the RECORD this morning, and I did it simply because the challenge was made on yesterday. If the plan announced by the Senator from Missouri is to be continued, I have a great deal more interesting material, and undoubtedly I will be in receipt from day to day of much additional information. This very morning a letter comes to me from New Hampshire showing that a large manufacturing concern has closed its doors and that the doors are to be kept closed until they get orders.

Mr. President, it will be of value to the people who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to find that the political party which promised such glowing results from the new tariff have failed to bring about what they promised.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I noticed in the Washington Post of this morning another piece of depressing information which seems to have escaped the notice of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. It was a résumé of the recent report of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. I discovered from that résumé that 336 subsidiary corporations of that concern have been practically put out of business. Those who are dependent upon them for a living, those who had invested their money in them, are principally inhabitants of New England, and their condition must be quite as deplorable as that of the poor workmen who seem to have been temporarily thrown out of employment in Wilmington I also noticed, Mr. President, that between sixty and ninety millions of dollars, doubtless representing the earnings of small investors, have been frittered away and wasted, if not stolen, through the agency of these 336 corporations, manipulated by the interests which are now so extremely concerned about business conditions and who desire to go back to the good old ways of doing business.

I drew an inference also from this report, Mr. President, that one man, since deceased, was primarily responsible for the creation of these 336 helpless subsidiary corporations as dummies to do the work which preceded the wrecking of the larger concern; but his responsibilities have ended. And I was reminded, too, of a clipping also taken from the Washington Post shortly after Mr. Morgan's unfortunate demise. It is an extract from his will, which I will read into the RECORD for the consolation of the New Haven's unfortunates. It is as follows:

I commit my soul into the hands of my Savior in full confidence that having redeemed it and washed it in His most precious blood He will present it faultless before the throne of my heavenly Father; and I entreat my children to maintain and defend, at all hazard, and at any cost of personal sacrifice, the blessed doctrine of the complete atonement for sin through the blood of Jesus Christ, once offered, and through that alone.

It seems pertinent to present this, but without comment, as a sort of companion piece to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, a great many of us, at least, do not know who "Holland" is, but, I take it, every Senator here will know the author of the article which I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read. It is a telegraphic dispatch to the New York World.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read from the New York World of Saturday, July 11, 1914, as follows:

PROSPERITY FIRST FINDS PITTSBURGH, NEWSPAPER SAYS—SENATOR OLIVER'S AFTERNOON DAILY DECLARES THAT IS THE OPINION VOICED BY LEADING BUSINESS MEN THERE—ALL BRANCHES OF TRADE FEEL RETURNING STIMULUS—STEEL PLANTS PUTTING ON MORE MEN, AND THERE IS $15,000,000 IN PRIVATE BUILDINGS.

[Special to the World.]

PITTSBURGH, July 10.

The Chronical-Telegraph, Senator GEORGE T. OLIVER'S afternoon daily paper, prints the following to-day:

"Pittsburgh is the first of American cities to recover from the depression in business which has affected the entire country"——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does the Senator from West Virginia think that such charges ought to be made against the Senator from Pennsylvania in his absence? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHILTON. I did not know the Senator from Pennsylvania was absent, and I have no doubt the Senator would not object to anyone accusing him of telling the truth, even in his absence.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the article, as follows:

"In this manufacturing district the ebb tide in the commercial and industrial field caused by the change in the Nation's tariff policy, the changes wrought in the banking and currency system, and the uncertainty in the railroad rate situation has been reached.

"Pittsburgh is returning to its old-time prosperity. This is the opinion voiced by leading manufacturers, bankers, and business men of the community.

"FEEL RETURNING STIMULUS.

"All branches of trade," the paper declares, "are feeling the stimulus of the return of normal conditions. The Pittsburgh pay roll, measured on the unexampled standard of $1,000,000 a day, again is making itself felt in the home commercial mart. This unrivaled asset in Pittsburgh business, and especially in guaranteeing the stability of the community's mercantile trade, is growing greater.

"Reports from the iron and steel industry for July in the Pittsburgh district show an increase over June of 10 per cent. The August outlook is still better. In the fall many new industries located by the Pittsburgh Industrial Development Commission will begin operations. All told, these concerns will give year round employment to skilled mechanics of the highest wage-earning capacity. This will mean at least 4,000 additional buyers who will augment the receipts of Pittsburgh merchants.

"$15,000,000 IN BUILDING.

"In building operations Pittsburgh this year is spending more than $15,000,000. This sum does not include the municipal improvements referred to by Mayor Armstrong. Financial men regard as a true index to the confident feeling of the people the readiness with which the municipal bonds for these improvements were bought.

"Meanwhile," it is said in the paper, "other Pittsburgh industries are indicating by their policy the arrival of highly fortunate times to come. The Jones & Laughlin Steel Co. has been employing additional men and the United States Steel Corporation also has been adding to its forces so the greatly increased demands of the immediate future may be met. The National Tube Co. is already working to 80 per cent of its capacity and soon will be working in full. The present building boom now so noticeable in Pittsburgh is declared by contracting engineers and builders to be the most remarkable experienced here in years. That this situation will be greatly exceeded seems apparent in the enormous building activity scheduled for the near future."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, lest this howl of calamity should overtop everything, and since it seems as though there were a preconcerted plan upon the part of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to burden the community all at once with this appalling cloud to mitigate somewhat that horrid condition, I desire to present some communications I have come across. I have copied verbatim from the New York Tribune of July 7, as I hesitated to mutilate the paper, the following item:

Pennsylvania orders 84 engines. Will spend $1,680,000. The locomotives will cost an average of $20,000 each.

If all this calamity exists, pray, I ask in all reason, why does the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. spend this money and for what purpose will it use these engines?

From the Journal of Commerce of July 7 I read the following:

The roads bought 19,000 tons during June, 1914.

In the Journal of Commerce of the same date I notice the following:

Heavy exports of wheat. Over 1,000,000 bushels will be shipped by St. Louis.

The same paper on the same date—and Senators can not charge the Journal of Commerce with being our paper—says:

Texas Co. buys 500 acres. Will expend in building refinery $2,000,000 and employ 1,000 men.

I also quote from the Journal of Commerce, as follows:

Paris, June 27, 1914. Wheat crop short. France will have to import 60,000,000 bushels of wheat.

Compare that with your statements in regard to the importation of corn.

The Journal of Commerce of July 8, 1914, states:

Kansas City and Southern Record: Gross earnings $11,000,000, or $50,000 greater than in 1913.

I will not tire the Senate by quoting the editorial in the paper of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to which reference has been made, wherein he goes on to show that in Pittsburgh they are fast approaching a million-dollar-a-day record in wages paid, but I will quote from an editorial in the Philadelphia Record—and I had really treasured this with the hope that my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] might be here, as I wanted to give this to him right from his own hearthstone—the Philadelphia Record editorially says:

All departments of the Pennsylvania Railroad's Altoona shops are working full time; some of them overtime. Contractors are having difficulty in getting men. The Baltimore & Ohio shops at Pittsburgh have added 800 men to their rolls. The crop demands have lessened the idle cars for the last half of June 12,000 cars. Failures were fewer in June than in previous month.

The Journal of Commerce of July 10, 1914, says:

Ford—

Of automobile fame—

says there is absolutely nothing wrong with business. All lines feel the awakening.

I quote again from the Journal of Commerce of July 10:

The American Chicle Co. increases business facilities.

The gratifying thing I see about that is that my Republican friends who are wont to cry calamity have ceased chewing the rag and have gone to chewing gum [laughter]—the Chicle Co. have multiplied their facilities.

The Journal of Commerce also says that $1,000,000 will be expended for improvements by the Tennessee Copper Co.

I now quote from the New York Times of July 10, 1914, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, July 10.

The Pennsylvania Railroad to-day gave orders for 100,000 tons of steel rails.

I quote another extract from the New York Times, as follows:

[Special to the New York Times, July 10, 1914.]

GETTING NEW ENGINES.

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul has just placed an order for five of the largest type of engines. This road recently stated that it had 90 idle engines.

In this connection, I notice that the New York Post, of July 11, 1914, says that Mr. Newman Erb, president of the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad, has just returned from Europe, and he finds even there that business prostration has existed and still exists, though it is somewhat picking up, and good business is in sight.

I met a gentleman night before last, Mr. Rapheal Herman, of Detroit, whose opinion as to the business outlook is published in the Washington Star of last evening. Representative DOREMUS, of Michigan, introduced Mr. Rapheal Herman to me as a curiosity. I said "In what way; he is a splendid looking fellow." Mr. Herman answered, "Well, I am a Republican and a protectionist, and yet I have the courage and temerity to assert that times are good and business is generally very much improving." I asked him in what particular line he was engaged, and he said that he was engaged in the manufacture of attachments and connections used in the manufacture of engines and boilers. "Well," said I, "it may be that is the condition in your particular part of the country"—he came from Detroit. He said, "No, sir; the best business I have is in the city of Philadelphia." Oh, that some phone might carry this to the ears of OLIVER and PENROSE, telling them that general conditions are infinitely better than they have been.

I say, Mr. President, that, while there are instances of depression and instances of idleness, yet, as I said here some days ago, we are reaping the result of a life of debauch and of ruthless extravagance, and it ill becomes Senators of the United States, in the face of all God's blessings that surround us, in the face of bountiful crops, with myriads of acres planted to corn that is just bursting into fruition and into wealth, and myriads of bushels of wheat that will supply not only the hungry mouths of our people, but the hungry mouths of the starving millions of the Old World, to cry calamity. I say it is a crime, and worse than a crime; in the midst of all these manifold blessings it is a sin. If our friends on the other side can get some comfort out of finding a condition of things where some poor mortal may have been thrown out of employment and his family starving, in God's name let them get it. I do not believe that they are warranted in uttering this calamity howl. I say, pick up and chirp and have courage. You know in your own hearts that you are blessed beyond comparison and almost beyond reason. We are richer, mayhap, than our deserts.

I say I could multiply the instances I have given by the hundreds. The Senator from New Hampshire knows that the testimony I have given is not the testimony of Democrats, but the testimony in the main—in fact, I think, almost without exception—of papers which uphold the Republican Party and that have voiced your propaganda and pressed on your dogma of protection until you have cursed the country and imposed a burden upon all mankind.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he does not think he is rather trenching upon the rule when he charges me with being guilty of crimes and sins? [Laughter.] I refer to the rule that says that one Senator shall not impute improper motives to another Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, that is very nice; but Heaven knows, and the Senate knows well, that my reference was not to an individual, but to a collection and aggregation of individuals made up of the Senator and others, who, under the guise and misnomer of the Republican Party, have burdened the people and have brought detriment to them. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think that it makes the offense the less, in view of what the rule prescribes, if he applies it to several of us?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, it spreads it out a little thinner. [Laughter.] The fact is, that if I should attempt to spread out the wrongs of the Republican Party, they would cover many, many people; but I have to say that as to the generous, glorious, genial, grand, big-hearted, and splendid Apollo, in the person of the Senator from New Hampshire, it would be impossible for a man to say anything very ungenerous or very unkind, and God knows that in my heart the Senator is the last man to whom I would charge any personal aim or intent to cause detriment to anybody; but you have been so long under the ban of Republican iniquity that you scarce know when to stop.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will forgive everything the Senator has said about me, though he has really violated the rule, if he will take back the appellation "Apollo" as applied to me. [Laughter.] I can not stand that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I want to be on the side of truth; and I think the Senator, as an M. D., must realize that he measures up better in physique than the average of God's children.

Mr. BORAH. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I send to the desk two telegrams in the nature of petitions from men and women of Mississippi, expressing their opinion upon the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. In their judgment and opinion I most heartily concur. I ask that the telegrams may be printed in the RECORD, without reading.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator prefers a request, it will be put to the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency recently held concerning the confirmation of Mr. Thomas D. Jones, the record made by the committee in that case and the report of the committee, as well as the minority views of four members of the committee, may be printed and made public.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, some one—possibly the Senator from Nebraska himself—has given out what purport to be the hearings before that committee. They have been printed broadcast. I do not know whether they have been correctly printed or not; but if this request is to be taken up now I move that the doors of the Senate be closed under Rule XXXV.

Mr. KERN. I second the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.
